Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table analyzing the actions of the 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses relating to the budget.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Actions taken by Congress on Presidential budgetary recommendations

[In millions]

	Actions affecting expenditures				Actions affecting receipts	Net total budgetary actions
	Action on appropriations	Other congressional actions	Expenditures avoided by veto	Net total
Action on Eisenhower recommendations:
Congresses controlled by Democrats:
85th Cong., 2d sess.	−$617	+$4,997	+$1,562	+$5,942	+$665	+$6,607
85th Cong., 1st sess.	−5,043	+1,910	+314	−2,819	----------	−2,819
84th Cong., 2d sess.	−257	+2,339	+307	+2,389	----------	+2,389
84th Cong., 1st sess.	−2,076	+1,642	+330	−104	----------	−104
Total, Congresses controlled by Democrats	−7,993	+10,888	+2,513	+5,408	+665	+6,073
Congresses controlled by Republicans: 83d Cong., 2d sess.	−2,610	+700	+312	−1,598	+1,000	−598
Total, action on Eisenhower recommendations	−10,603	+11,588	+2,825	+3,810	+1,665	+5,475
Action on Truman recommendations:
Congress controlled by Republicans: 83d Cong., 1st sess.	[1]−12,034	−33	----------	−12,067	----------	−12,067
Grand total	−22,637	+11,555	+2,825	−8,257	+1,665	−6,592

[1] Reflects final action by the Congress on President Truman's fiscal year 1954 budget, which was submitted in January 1953 before Eisenhower took office. Although the new Republican administration requested substantially less than the Truman budget when agency heads appeared before Appropriations Committees, the exact total of Eisenhower recommendations for fiscal year 1954 is not available. Thus, no comparison between congressional action and Eisenhower for fiscal year 1954 is possible. Assistant Budget Director Hughes, on June 1, 1953, told the House Ways and Means Committee the Eisenhower administration had at that time reduced Truman's budget by $8.5 billion and that undoubtedly there would be further cuts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I may say also that my analysis is based upon figures found in a statement entitled, "Congressional Actions Affecting Receipts or Expenditures," dated February 12, 1959, and prepared by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. President, when all the collateral actions of the Congress are considered, along with the strictly appropriations actions, we see that the Congress actually voted to increase Federal spending by a net total of $5,475 million over the five Eisenhower budgets.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has the Senator from Massachusetts included in his recapitulation the amount contained in bills which did not pass; the amount which was saved by the failure of Congress to pass about 19,000 bills which were introduced?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The figures do not include that item.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Since the Senator has spoken about bills vetoed and the amount saved by vetoes, would it not be comparable to include a statement that Congress also "vetoed" about 19,000 bills in the 85th Congress?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I agree with the majority leader that Congress by failing to act did not, of course, actually appropriate or spend that money; but I think it would be impossible to reach an actual figure on that item, because the committees did not act on many of those bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But would not that amount be just as relevant as the figures which the Senator cited?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. No, I would not agree with that statement, because the figures I cited came from the budget. They are the actual amounts on which Congress acted. I would read again to the distinguished Senator five titles, because I want this to be absolutely clear:

Actions on appropriations. These are the figures which the distinguished Senator discussed when he spoke of the $5,600 million cut.

Other congressional actions. Those are the actions which Congress actually took on bills which were signed.

Next, expenditures avoided by veto. This was the estimate of the cost to the Government of bills passed by Congress if the President had not vetoed them.

There is also the figure for actions affecting receipts; that is, what happened to bills relating to taxes.

That would make the net total of budgetary actions on Eisenhower recommendations a net increase of $5,475 million. But if we include the action on the Truman recommendations—a cut of $12,065 million—this would leave a net cut in the budget, including everything, over the five Eisenhower budgets and the one Truman budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. One combination is a better way to put it, is it not?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is correct. It was, however, a Truman budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As revised by President Eisenhower.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It was revised by President Eisenhower and further revised by Congress. The table shows a net cut, for 6 years, of $6,592 million. This is derived from an increase of $5,400 million in the five Eisenhower budgets, offset by $12 billion cut from the Truman budget.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. If I may so presume from his statement, the Senator is saying that the Nation would be better off if Congress had never proposed to spend any money for any of the various programs to which he has referred. I hope he does not suggest by his statement that it would have been better if Congress had never met at all and never conceived any new ideas.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. If we were to go back and analyze our actions in the last 5 years, I am certain the RECORD will show that I voted for a number of the bills which Congress enacted. I would not be truthful if I said otherwise.

Mr. LONG. I hope the Senator is not suggesting that he, together with the rest of us, was in error when we did so.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I am not suggesting anything about motives. I say that, in most cases, the actions which we took were thoroughly justified.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I commend the Senator from Massachusetts for his statement.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am always captivated by the eloquence of my delightful friend and minority leader, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. One of my most stirring recollections is of an occasion 26 years ago, when the present minority leader made his maiden speech in the House of Representatives.

Then, again, I recall the very able, persuasive statement which the minority leader made when he nominated our beloved friend, the late Senator Robert A. Taft, at the Republican National Convention in 1952. In warm tones, the minority leader nominated Senator Taft and warned the people of the country against the error they would make by following the advice of the former Governor of New York, Mr. Dewey, and supporting the present President of the United States, Mr. Eisenhower.

Today, I heard the minority leader defend the administration. He first admitted that every statement we have made with regard to the reductions which Congress has made in appropriations is correct. He then pulled in some authorizations, some vetoes, some bills which did not pass, some taxes which were not levied, and some postal receipts which were not raised and came to the conclusion that, after all, the resulting figure was the fault of Congress.

Mr. President, that performance reminds me very much of a situation which developed in our hill country during the early days of the depression. A poor schoolteacher in search of a job applied to the hill country school board. The members of the board were rather impressed by his presentation. He was eloquent; generally, he was rather factual; he was impressive. So the members of the school board said to him, "Well, we think we would like to have you teach, and we would like to retain your services. But tell us this: There is some difference of opinion, in our community, about geography; and we want to know which side you are on. Do you teach that the world is round, or do you teach that the world is flat?"

The eloquent applicant responded immediately by saying, "I can teach it either way." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, notwithstanding everything that has been said here today, notwithstanding the stirring statement which has been made, the minority leader has demonstrated that he can "teach it either way."

First of all, the appropriations he outlined were reduced by the Congress. Second, in the case of the authorization bills which were passed—and which thus resulted in having appropriation items go in by the so-called "back door" method—every dollar spent under them was approved by the President, and most of them were voted for by the minority leader. So, Mr. President, I do not know who is trying to kid whom.

Mr. President, what have we done here? The Senator from Illinois has lumped together some items for ships and shoes and sealing wax and cabbages and kings, and then he has jumped into a pile of authorization bills, and has said, "This is how much money the Congress overspent the President's budget."

Well, Mr. President, I desire to warn the Foreign Relations Committee, which I trust will soon commence hearings on a very important matter, that it is likely to be faced with similar charges in the next few days. Last week the President sent to the Senate a message in which he made a request for an urgent supplemental item for the fiscal year 1959—even though the administration already has on hand for this purpose more than $1 billion. Now the President says he must have immediate action, applicable to the fiscal year 1959, for an additional $3,175 million of obligational authority for the International Bank. He has also requested, for the fiscal year 1959, an additional $1,375 million of new obligational authority for estimated expenditures for the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. President, when that committee considers those items, I know it is going to consider them in the national interest, and it is going to do what it thinks it ought to do.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. Is the Senator from Texas suggesting that the request for the International Bank would have any impact on this year's budget, or even on next year's budget?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No, I am not. But I am suggesting that after we carry out the President's request, we may have to defend ourselves as we do today in the case of the Export-Import Bank against charges of having passed some authorization legislation; and we may have to defend ourselves against such accusations, coming from spokesmen of the President's own party, because we vote to carry out the President's own wishes. That is what I am suggesting.

Mr. BUSH. But the Senator from Texas agrees with me, does he not, that the recommendations in regard to the International Bank do not have any impact on this year's budget or on next year's budget?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I agree; and I did not say they would have such an impact.

Mr. BUSH. I did not say the Senator from Texas said that. I merely say that I am sure the Senator from Texas knows that they do not affect the budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is the Senator from Connecticut sure?

Mr. BUSH. Yes; I am sure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Where will the $3 billion-plus which the President has requested, come from?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. As I understand, he is requesting obligational authority; and I think that is not a great deal different from a good deal of the obligational authority for which we have been criticized today by the minority leader.

All I wish to do is point out that when, at the request of the President, we vote to increase the authority of the Export-Import Bank or the authorizations for the Government's guarantees in various fields, Senators are likely to find themselves attacked, in a few weeks, for having voted to comply with the President's requests.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me ask the distinguished majority leader whether it is not true that the President asked that this item be placed in the 1959 budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is true.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And, of course, the 1959 budget has a deficit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It has.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Everyone recognizes that. Yet here is an item which ordinarily should have been included in the 1960 budget. But in an effort to balance the 1960 budget, it is proposed that this item be pushed back into the budget for the previous year, for which the officials know there is a deficit. In other words, if there is to be a $13 billion deficit, a little more will not matter very much, so they seem to think. Furthermore, they seem to take the position that such an item will not have to be budgeted.

They condemn us for "bringing things in by the back door"; but in this case the President brings this item in by the back door, and attempts to slip it into last year's account. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. I should like to point out that in the supplemental budget message which has been received from the President, the Congress is requested to make an immediate appropriation. We are told that they cannot wait for the 1960 budget, but that they must have $225 million at once for the Development Loan Fund, and that that amount will be added to the 1959 budget. They are asking for $1 billion-plus to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for losses sustained from the sale of agricultural-commodity surpluses.

Of course, it is all right to ask Congress to appropriate $1 billion-plus for this purpose, if someone down town can tell us how the administration is going to use the local currencies. By such means, local currencies will be "generated" and "warehoused," and the Government will have to "pay the rent" on the "warehouse," in much the same way that the Government is having to pay rent on the wheat that is placed in storage. Little attention is being paid to what is done with the local currencies; but everything that can be dumped into the budget for the fiscal year 1959—as the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] has said— will go into that budget.

It does not seem to matter to this administration whether the deficit for the fiscal year 1959 amounts to $12 billion, $13 billion, $15 billion, or $20 billion. The administration's attitude seems to be that everything pertaining to the 1959 budget is old hat.

The administration seems to say, "We are going to be Simon pure budget-balancers for the fiscal year 1960! That is the only year that amounts to anything. Dump all these other items into the 1959 fiscal year budget. It shows a big deficit, anyway."

Strangely enough, Mr. President, fiscal year 1960 happens to end in a presidential election year, and is the last full year for which this administration will be accountable. So Mr. Eisenhower says, "Forget about the 1959 budget, but look out for the 1960 budget."

The administration will tell us how to rig the budget items so they will not have to be counted in the 1960 budget, and so the "cat will be put on the back" of the next President. The administration's advice to us seems to be, "Kill the country's progress; destroy the country's safety and security, if necessary; but keep our record on the 1960 budget crystal clear, because 1960 is an election year."

Mr. President, evidently that is the slogan of the Republican Party, and that is what all the shouting is about.

When the majority leader said that the President's budget is a political budget, that description is as accurate as anything could be; and that statement should be blazoned in neon light 11 feet high, so that all can see it clearly.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In just a moment, Mr. President.

I should like to point out what is happening here, today. The other day we had a preview of it in the Washington Post and Times Herald, which contained a statement to the effect that the Bureau of the Budget plans "to keep the box score," and is going "to keep the box score," so it will be able to "blow the whistle" on the Congress.

Well, Mr. President, I do not know about that; but certainly the Republican Party "blew" the last election. [Laughter.]

In the last campaign, spokesmen for the Republican Party charged various candidates with being Socialists and spenders. And when we stood them up one by one, the chairmen of the committees and the Members of Congress, and let the people look at them and see which ones were the "Socialists," the people gave their answer.

When we gave the people the box score on appropriations, what happened? Not a single member of the majority party who was a candidate for reelection failed to obtain approval of the people, and 15 Democratic Senators were elected; and the people got the Republican Party down just about as low as one can get it—I mean in numbers. [Laughter.] There is an election every 2 years. We have 98 Members of this body. That means 32 Members were up for election then. The Republicans now have 34 Members on their side of the aisle. So I think the people understood these charges. But in order that nobody can confuse the situation, I want to point out what the Senator from Illinois has done.

He has admitted the Congress reduced appropriations by $22 billion. He does not deny it. But, he says, Congress makes some authorizations. I do not deny that. I am glad the Senator from Illinois has learned the legislative process. We do make authorizations.

Then he says, "Well, you went in some back door and had some Government guarantees." The Budget Bureau said it is like giving one's wife a budget, and then having the wife charge for food. It is not like that. It is like having money for food, and then signing a note. When we do that they say we "go in the back door," but we do not go in there alone. Who went in the back door with us? The same people who have made all the fuss about the back door today.

Here is the emergency housing bill. It was passed in a great emergency. What was the vote on it? Eighty-six to nothing. That was approved by the President, or it would not have been effective. That measure was voted for by every Member of this body.

The highway construction bill was another back door, but who was elbowing me trying to get in the back door? Why, the distinguished minority leader himself, plus 82 of his colleagues. The vote was 84 to 4.

Where was the President? He signed on the dotted line, saying, "I approve." The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], the Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], did not approve.

I could go on for a good deal of the afternoon.

Here is one bill for the construction of superliners. I see my friend from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] present, who tries to economize on every action. I remember vividly his activities in connection with that bill. The vote was 41 to 18. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] voted "nay" on it. I think that was one of the vetoed items.

I have before me the rollcall on the Agricultural Act. The vote was 62 to 11. That was one of the bills referred to.

Here is the area redevelopment bill. The vote on that bill was 46 to 36. A good many Senators voted against that bill. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] voted against it, but not my beloved friend from Illinois. He was for it. He was in there at the back door. He must have felt like the preacher of the little country church. The church caught fire and he got to the door. All the brethren were shoving and trying to get out the door. The preacher said "The church has got just one door." [Laughter.] That is the way my friend must have felt—he was trying to get in the back door.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. With reference to the last two bills the Senator mentioned, did the Senator from Massachusetts not vote in the negative? I believe I did vote in the negative.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I certainly want to see that the Senator is accurately recorded. If the Senator believes he voted "nay" and wants the RECORD to show that, the Senator's word is all I need for it.

Let me refer now to the Housing Act of 1957, which has been talked about. That is another "back door" approach. We called the roll on that one. We ought to have more roll calls. I wish to announce that, so far as I am concerned, if the Senate will support me, I am going to ask for the yeas and nays on every appropriation bill this year. Do not tell me votes on appropriation bills count for nothing. We can see who votes for what.

On this housing bill, another back door approach, the vote was 69 to 1. That was the Housing Act of 1957. The one negative vote was by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

I desire to summarize very briefly by saying we have a great deal of confusion here. The minority leader admits the Congress has reduced the budget estimates on various bills by a total of $22 billion over a period of 6 years. That has been confirmed by my friend from Massachusetts. He has stated there were also some vetoes. I was aware of the fact that there were some vetoes. There were 20,000 bills introduced in Congress during the 85th Congress. Only 1200 became law, so about 19,000 of them were "vetoed" by the Congress, and a half dozen or so were vetoed by the President. It is enlightening to have it repeated, but it does not affect the appropriation situation one iota, because it was not what I was talking about.

Then the Senator from Illinois referred to the fact that we come in the "back door." That is true. All the money spent by the Government does not come through the Appropriations Committees. We have guarantees. We frequently make a profit on these guarantees. We have obligations. We frequently make a profit on those obligations. But legislation like the housing bill is what is popularly referred to as "a back-door approach." We have made those back-door approaches, but we have made them together. We have made them unanimously. We have made them with the President's approval. When we vote, in a good many instances—not in all of them—unanimously in this Chamber, I see no basis on which to criticize such action. As a matter of fact, I think the whole issue was set up in an attempt to confuse the situation.

It reminds me of the story former Vice President Barkley used to tell about the cuckoo clock a fellow had in the hills of Kentucky. Some of his neighbors wanted him to get rid of it because they did not think it was keeping good time. He said, "It keeps good time." He said, "When the hands point at 2 and the clock strikes 4, it is half past 6." [Laughter.] That is comparable to what the other side is trying to say about the reductions made by Congress in the appropriations.

The 85th Congress was a prudent Congress—not because we had a margin of two votes in it. It was prudent on the part of both sides. I have referred to the policy of that Congress as a prudent, progressive policy. Most of the appropriation bills were passed by unanimous votes, and those bills were signed by the President, indicating he approved the reductions we made. As a matter of fact, the President invited us to cut his budget estimate.

I think there is enough credit for all of us. I did not say anything about the Republican National Committee. I did not say anything about the Republican Party. They got themselves in this mess.

I have found that if one gives them enough time they will always get involved. That is what they have done now.

I have said that the Congress would look at each appropriation bill and would try to be prudent, and that is what we are going to do.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to make two comments with regard to what the Senator has said and also with regard to the remarks of the Senator from Oklahoma, who has now left the Chamber.

My first comment is with regard to the reference the Senator from Texas made to the back-door procedure. Such a phrase is a little bit of an expression, that one does not go in the front door but goes in the back door.

Congress has a right to do all of the things which have been recounted, and has a duty to do all of these things, as the Senator pointed out to the Senator from Louisiana. The Senator from Massachusetts simply says that these congressional actions of the Senate and the House are actions of bodies having an obligation or a duty to do as they see fit with regard to these actions, even if it does increase the appropriations recommended by the President. We have to take that into consideration in deciding on our actions.

Furthermore, with regard to the 86 to 0 votes, it is necessary to concern ourselves with the amendments. The fights took place as to the amendments. When the amendments were lost, as they were lost in many instances, those of us who felt that some bill was better than no bill voted for the bill, yet in all instances we did not do so, as the Senator from Texas pointed out with respect to the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators.

What I should like to point out to my colleague from Texas is that what I should like to have him remark is not something as to a back-door operation, but something as to an overall operation which has to be considered in deciding what the Congress has done.

I should also like to make one observation to the Senator from Oklahoma. If a sound budget is a political budget and is a propaganda budget, then I am in favor of that kind of a budget.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, so long as the Senator from Massachusetts has brought up the question of a political budget, I think it should be said we ought to face up to the realities as they exist and not as the administration wishes them to be. The so-called balanced budget is based upon a recommendation by the President that postal rates on first-class mail be increased from 4 cents to 5 cents; that the Federal gasoline tax be increased by 1½ cents; and that the interest rates paid by the REA's be increased by 100 percent, from 2 percent to 4 percent. Only with those "ifs, ands, and buts" will it be a balanced budget of the type which the President desires.

I am a little bit surprised by the attitude of the Republican leader and some of his colleagues, who are taking the side of the administration against the Senate, of which they are Members, because there have been $22 billion in reductions below what the President asked for, on an overall basis, during the past 6 years of his administration; 2 years when the Republicans were in control and 4 years when the Democrats were in control. We ought to be standing up shoulder to shoulder, instead of having the majority leader carry the burden for all of us, because this is what the Congress has done, not what the administration has done. The record will speak for itself. It is about time that we stick together and brag about what Congress has done in the past 6 years, under both Democratic and Republican control. It is a record to be proud of instead of to be sniped at, such as we are observing. We ought to be standing up and boasting about what we did in this body.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Montana. I have no doubt that this discussion will be healthy so far as the budget is concerned, and so far as the appropriation bills which will soon be before the Senate are concerned.

I should like now to conclude my statement.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator continues, will he yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. A few minutes ago the distinguished Senator from Texas was talking about some of the housing programs which are carried on under the obligational authority, or outside the appropriations, at least, and it was stated that some of the programs had made a profit. I think it would be well to note at this time that housing, overall, has made a profit.

The FHA program, during the 20 years or so in which it has been operating, has accrued a net profit of nearly $800 million; and the Federal National Mortgage Association during its time of operations, in providing a market for the mortgages, has made a profit of nearly $300 million. In other words, those operations have made a profit of more than a billion dollars, and I am speaking only of the field of housing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator could include the REA program.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And the Senator from Montana would include the RFC. Of course, we have followed this same type of financing for all the programs. I have a table in my hand with regard to our housing programs, which shows how each one of the programs is financed, though I shall not take the time to read it all. Every single program financed outside of the direct appropriations has been approved—and most of the programs have been initiated—by the administration itself. That is the way the programs have been carried on. We know that is true with respect to many other programs.

I agree with what the Senator from Texas has said.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to comment on the remarks of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. A great deal of what has been said today serves only to confuse the minds of the people of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that is true.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It will make the people critical of programs which both the present administration and preceding administrations have followed as perfectly good practices.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have asked the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to immediately proceed to consider the President's message and to conduct hearings which will probably result in this Government taking on additional obligations pursuant to the President's request. I hope we have not reached a time when we will be criticized because we comply with such requests.

I do not want to reflect on this "back door" approach. I think the administration did what was right when it recommended we take this approach in several instances. I think Congress did what was right when we took the approach without the recommendation of the administration.

In each instance, however, I would point out that every dollar spent was spent pursuant to the approval of the President, because we have not overridden a single veto. I think the RECORD should show that. All of these things the Senator is talking about—the oranges and apples and bananas, adding up to one grapefruit—were considered with the approval of the President of the United States. Most of those actions were taken by a unanimous vote or nearly a unanimous vote. With a few exceptions the actions were taken with the approval of the minority leader.

Mr. President, I am not going to apologize for that. I say we reduced appropriations in the Congress $22 billion over a 6-year period. I am not here to say how much we authorized during that period, because we authorized much more than we appropriated. We authorized some things for which there will never be appropriations. I am not going to try to pull the wool over anybody's eyes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois says that the budget reflects what is taken in in the form of taxes and what goes out in the form of expenditures. I agree with that statement. If that is the case, why has the Senator lumped together authorizations which run for 10 years ahead, in some instances; expenditures which never did take place; tax increases which were never made; postal bills which were never passed; and legislation which was vetoed and never signed into law?

In common with my colleagues of both parties in the Senate, I have a desire to balance the budget. I have tried to put that desire into effect by cutting the appropriations, and we have been successful in doing so.

If the President determines that in his judgment the bills which we send to him from the Congress are unwise, then the President has the prerogative—yes, he has the duty—to veto such bills. The President could have exercised that prerogative as to any bill which the Senator mentioned.

The only thing I know that Congress can do about the budget is to operate on the appropriations requests. I believe if we go over each one of the requests line by line, and base our judgment on the facts which are developed, the ultimate result will satisfy the majority of the people of this country.

Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas will permit, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Massachusetts so that the Senator may ask a question of the Senator from Alabama, without my losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask one question and to make one brief comment.

As I understand the figures provided by the Bureau of the Budget, with respect to the Emergency Housing Act of 1958, there are estimated expenditures of $144 million for 1959 and of $133 million for 1960. My question of the Senator from Alabama is: The receipts, I assume, go into the General Treasury, so they are not shown. Am I correct in that belief?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I would be very much interested, for the sake of clearing the record and making it all-inclusive, to have the Senator from Alabama show what the receipts for 1959 were under that act, and the estimated receipts for 1960, if he has those figures.

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I do not have them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have the President's original estimate of spending for 1956, 1957, 1958, and 1959, the actual result of that spending, and the amount that was spent over what the President estimated would be spent.

For the fiscal year 1959, the President estimated that he would spend $73,900 million. He actually spent $80,900 million. He spent a total of $7 billion over the estimate, notwithstanding the fact that during the fiscal year 1959 the Congress reduced his appropriations requests.

For the fiscal year 1958 the President estimated that he would spend $71.8 billion. He spent $71.9 billion, a difference of $100 million.

For the fiscal year 1957 the President estimated that he would spend $65.1 billion. He spent $69.4 billion, an increase of $4,300 million.

For the fiscal year 1956 the President estimated that he would spend $62.4 billion. He spent $66.5 billion, or an increase of $4.1 billion.

On the basis of this record the American people are entitled to their doubts as to the validity of the precariously balanced 1960 budget to which the Senator from Montana referred.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I believe the Senaor from Alabama can answer my question if he will place in the RECORD the figures to which I have referred.

Mr. SPARKMAN. First, let me correct something which both the Senator and I said erroneously a few moments ago, namely, that the receipts would go into the Treasury. This money was made available to the Federal National Mortgage Association, and with it that Association bought mortgages. When the mortgages are paid off, or when it sells the mortgages, the money comes to the Federal National Mortgage Association, which makes disposition of the funds. However, the program has been in operation for such a short time that I dare say there are no returns as yet.

The information which the Senator has may be subsequent to mine, but according to my information only $95 million was spent up to December 31, 1958, out of $1 billion. Much of that sum would have been committed, but not yet spent.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The figures I have are estimated expenditures of $144 million for the fiscal year 1959 and $133 million for the fiscal year 1960. I wonder if the Senator knows how much came in, in the form of receipts, to offset those figures.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The receipts would be inconsequential so soon after the beginning of the program.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has the Senator from Massachusetts concluded his questions?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Let me make an observation. On page M-4 of the 1960 budget the figures for expenditures and receipts for the past 8 years are shown. While the Senator from Alabama was absent from the Chamber, I placed those figures in the RECORD, in the form of a statement to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. I assume those are the same figures which the Senator from Texas was just reading.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not know; but I am sure that the Senator from Massachusetts has been fair and accurate with whatever figures he has handled.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I try to be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Not only does the Senator try to be fair, but I am sure he is.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to make this comment to my friend from Montana:

As I see it, in connection with any budget, the President has a right to estimate the revenues, the obligations, and the expenditures. Congress has the responsibility of raising taxes. If Congress does not see fit to do so, that is another matter. But I do not believe that such a budget request can be considered a political request. It may have political implications, but essentially it is sound practice to make estimates in an effort to keep a balanced budget.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Has the President requested that tax increases be brought about?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Such a request would go to the House of Representatives. I am frank to say that I do not know as yet, but, from conversations I have heard, I assume that such requests will come in due course.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I think the President not only has the right to make estimates, but he has the duty to do so, and he carries out that duty. As a coequal branch of the Government, we have the right and duty to make our estimates.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is the judgment of many people that over a period of time the administration has made grevious errors as to the amount it proposed to spend. In other words, it spends more than it estimates it will spend.

Some people seriously question the optimistic picture of revenue presented in this year's budget. I do not question anyone's motives or accuracy. I have not heard all the arguments pro and con, but let me cite an example. I now read excerpts from the testimony given before the House committee. I ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] to listen to the following excerpts from the testimony on this subject:

Mr. MAHON. The effect of it in this case is not to make any money or lose any money for the Government but to make the Government look better from a budgetary and fiscal standpoint, is that it?

Mr. STANS. I think I can answer you this way: The alternative, sir, is as you imply to show a deficit, to go out and finance a deficit by selling more bonds or raising taxes.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. MAHON a moment ago was asking you about FNMA. Are you not swapping some 4 and 4½ percent bonds for some 2 and 2½ percent bonds? Do you make a calculation for that difference in that interest, or is there any difference in interest?

Mr. STANS. There is a difference in interest rates. There is also a difference in the cost of servicing.

Mr. THOMAS. Who gets that difference in the interest rate, the buyer?

Mr. STANS. The owner.

Mr. THOMAS. And the Government loses it?

Mr. STANS. There will be a difference in the interest.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Goovernment lose the difference in the two rates?

Mr. STANS. Yes, but it is also relieved from servicing the mortgages; is that not a fact?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, yes; by how much actually does the taxpayer lose in the deal? You have a Government guaranteed obligation. Of course, it does not necessarily mean to me that that obligation is ever going to cost the Government anything because most of those funds are repaid. I do not know that the FHA has ever cost the taxpayers a penny yet. Their outside liability is about $20 billion, and I think their cash in bank is about $650 million. After some 20 or 25 years that has not cost the taxpayers anything, so why give away that spread?

Mr. STANS. Mr. Thomas, we are not giving away any spread because the alternative to this exchange is to issue new debts by the Federal Government and if the Federal Government issues long-term debt equal to the length of these mortgages, as of now it is paying at least 4 percent——

Mr. THOMAS. Most of FNMA's is 4½ and 5½.

Mr. STANS. Yes; and they have to be serviced and U.S. Government bonds do not have to be serviced.

Mr. THOMAS. That is right; but FNMA does not pay a full point and a half for servicing its bonds anyway.

Mr. STANS. I do not know what it costs to service them.

I think the RECORD should show that testimony.

I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if, as a result of that exchange, in his opinion the taxpayer will pay additional money.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As I understand that transaction——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not familiar with it. All I know is what is contained in this colloquy. That is the reason why I ask the Senator's judgment.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. As I understand—and I am not sure I am correct—it is a question whether one would rather have a Government bond as such than to hold an FNMA mortgage, which may not be a very good mortgage.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? That is not the question at all.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. There may be a difference in interest.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the question is not at all as the senior Senator from Massachusetts has stated it. The question the senior Senator from Texas has raised is whether this transaction is an actual budgetary saving to the U.S. Government, or an actual loss which is claimed as a saving.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. What is the opinion of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GORE. It is an actual loss to the taxpayers. It is bookkeeping legerdemain to lay claim to a balanced budget in this way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Why does the Senator think it is done that way?

Mr. GORE. In order to claim that the budget is balanced. It is a phony claim to make. It is no more balanced than the President's budgets have been balanced for the past 3 fiscal years, including the budget for this fiscal year. The figures show that in the last 4 fiscal years, including the present one, the actual expenditures have been more than $15 billion in excess of estimated budgetary expenditures.

The budget presented for the next fiscal year is no more balanced than is the budget for the present fiscal year, which was claimed to be balanced a year ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. A year ago it was claimed to be balanced; is that correct?

Mr. GORE. Yes, I believe so. The senior Senator from Massachusetts stated that the budget has political implications. He further stated, a moment ago, that it was essentially sound if an attempt was made to balance the budget. No genuine attempt is made. The claim is made, instead. The proposed budget is not balanced. I doubt that any Member of the Senate would rise to the responsibility of saying that it is balanced. It will not be balanced 1 year from now.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I do not intend to get into any argument on that point. I believe the President is sincere in presenting the budget. He feels it is a balanced budget. What Congress will do with it ultimately, on receipts and expenditures, is the responsibility of Congress ultimately to submit back to the President. On the item referred to, that is a very technical item——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. First I should like to say that the item referred to is a very technical item. I believe that my answer was a reasonably correct answer, based on the information that has been furnished to me. I do not know whether I answered it 100 percent correctly. I believe I answered it correctly, however.

Mr. GORE. I should like to inquire of the senior Senator from Massachusetts if he likewise believes that President Eisenhower was sincere in the presentation of his budget for fiscal year 1959.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I assume so. I do not know what the Senator has in mind specifically.

Mr. GORE. I question the accuracy of the estimates. While I do not question the sincerity of the President, I do question the accuracy of the estimates, or the accuracy of the people who gave the President the estimates. I am not sure how sincere they were.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. We can always question that.

Mr. GORE. The record shows that there will be an estimated expenditure of $7 billion more than the budget estimate of a year ago. I should like to ask the senior Senator from Massachusetts if he assumes that President Eisenhower was sincere in presenting the budget for 1958, for fiscal year 1957, and for fiscal year 1956.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Of course I do.

Mr. GORE. I take it that he so assumes. The fact is that the Presidential budget has not been balanced in any of the 4 years, and the budget for the next fiscal year is, in the opinion of the junior Senator from Tennessee, no more balanced or as nearly balanced as the budget in any of the preceding 4 years.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to make one further comment. Of course the estimates are never the same as the figures actually come out. Sometimes the estimates are more and sometimes they are less. Sometimes the expenditures are more and sometimes they are less. The estimates are made, as a general rule, and the figures are submitted, somewhere between 12 and 18 months prior to the time Congress acts.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Furthermore, I should like to say to the senior Senator from Massachusetts that if Congress had appropriated the amounts requested by the President, the unbalance to which I have referred, would have been greater.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I do not believe that is the full statement. If we had appropriated the full amounts, we would have appropriated, in the five Eisenhower budgets, $10,600 million more, but Congress added $11,500 million.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In what form?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In the form of congressional action.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In bookkeeping financing, in bills vetoed, and all the other things. By adding all of them together we get an Amos and Andy figure. That only confuses the Senate and the country. Congress did not appropriate $10 billion more. It actually reduced appropriations by $10 billion. There have been added some authorizations, some pledges, and some vetoes. The point I make is that I do not believe we have a true and accurate picture of how much money was spent and that the Government will owe.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The figures which the Senator from Texas has brought out and the figures that I have brought out show the picture. I can get those figures again, if it is necessary to do so.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has included authorizations. There are authorizations in effect for over 100 years for which not one dime has been expended. An authorization does not make an expenditure. I referred to actual appropriations. Neither do authorizations make appropriations.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. And appropriations do not make expenditures.

Mr. GORE. The statement I made was that if Congress had actually appropriated the total amount requested by President Eisenhower, the deficits would have been greater.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. They would have been increased by $5 billion.

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I should like to go back to the statement with respect to the FNMA mortgages in the amount of $350 million——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. $335 million, I believe.

Mr. BUSH. What is the figure?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. $335 million.

Mr. BUSH. The $335 million, which the Senator said is being labeled for sale in order to balance the budget. I should like to say to the Senator—because those mortgages were paid for with taxpapers' money—if they are sold, there is no other place where they can be credited, but in the same account to which they were charged originally.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understood that they were swapped for Government bonds.

Mr. BUSH. It would be a good thing for this country if the Treasury were able to sell a good many more of those bonds. We have approximately $5,400 million tied up right now, in taxpayers' money, in those mortgages. It seems to me that a move to liquidate some of them is a very sensible thing to do. There is no other place where we can credit the income from those mortgages except in the place from which they were paid.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I welcome and respect the opinion of such an authority in this field as the able Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I merely refer the Senator to the exchange which occurred in the House of Representatives Committee on Appropriations between that committee and the Budget Director, in which it was stated that we were trading 2½ percent for 4½ percent, and that the 2-percent difference was going to cost the taxpayers some money. I did not testify to that effect. The Director of the Budget evidently is willing to admit that it will cost money, but that we ought to allow him something for servicing the mortgages. The question was asked: "Will the Government lose the difference in the two rates?" The answer was "Yes."

I do not know who will benefit from it.

Mr. BUSH. I do not believe it is very beneficial to the taxpayers——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. When a loss of 2 percent is sustained in an operation, maybe it will be beneficial to the bankers.

Mr. BUSH. I do not believe it is beneficial to the taxpayers to build up a surplus in mortgages to the extent of over $5 billion, any more than it is beneficial to build up farm products to the extent of eight or nine billion dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator may be correct.

Mr. BUSH. I do not believe the administration should be condemned for trying to get rid of some mortgages and crediting something to the taxpayers, for a change.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not condemning anyone. I do not believe in condemnations. I do not want to condemn anyone. I am merely reciting the colloquy in the House Committee on Appropriations which shows that the Government was losing 2½ percent, and that the difference between 2½ and 4½ or 5 percent can be as much as 2 or 2½ percent. I was reciting the Budget Director's testimony, and I am glad to have the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts and also the opinion of my cherished friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I do not wish to get into the argument as to who killed Cock Robin. I am sure a great many people feel that neither political party has strained any muscles in cutting Government expenditures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think the Senator is right. I agree with him.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I understood the Senator from Tennessee to make the statement that there has not been a balanced budget in 5 or 6 years.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I made no such statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Anyway, to keep the record straight what did you say?

Mr. GORE. Let us keep it straight. Just what did I say?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. If the Senator will wait just a moment I will tell him since he has forgotten.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Delaware says he wants to keep the RECORD straight.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I understood the Senator from Tennessee to say that there was not a balanced budget in 1956, 1957, or 1958.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think the budget was balanced in 1956 and 1957.

Mr. GORE. I was referring to expenditures.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is what I am referring to. The expenditures in 1956 and 1957 were less than the receipts. The budget was balanced. That is what I am trying to straighten out.

Mr. GORE. I was referring to the Presidential estimates—the budgetary estimates of expenditures.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. We have learned long ago that budgets are not balanced by estimates made either by the President or by the Congress.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Delaware has taken a different cue. We were talking about budgets presented by the President of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I am speaking of actual expenditures as they are related to our income.

Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas further yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I think the real answer to this question is not which political party voted for the most cuts or which political party talks the loudest. Actually, the question is which political party lived within its income by spending less than the amount of revenue.

Going back to 1900, there have been only 25 times when either political party has lived within the income of the U.S. Government. In the other 34 years, the Government has lived beyond its income. During this period there were only 11 times that the Republican Party operated our Government at a deficit, whereas the Democrat Party operated at a deficit in 23 of the 26 years.

In 22 years the Republican Party operated with a surplus. That does not take into consideration the estimated deficit of from $10 billion to $12 billion this year for which the actual figures are not as yet available.

On the other hand, the Democratic Party, which has had control of the Government for 26 years since 1900, has lived within its income but 3 years out of the 26. In arriving at the 26-year figure for Democratic control, I charged the 80th Congress to the Republican Party since President Truman disclaimed all responsibility.

The total shows that in 26 years the Democratic Party's deficits amounted to over $268 billion. Their surpluses in 3 years amounted to $3,800 million, leaving a net deficit of $265 billion. That is the amount which the Democratic Party spent over and above what it took in during their 26-year tenure in office.

On the other hand, in the years when the Republican Party was in control of the Government—33 years—in 11 years we had a deficit of $22,900 million. In the 22 years in which we had surpluses, we took in $20,800 million more than we spent. Therefore, our net deficit for the 33 years is a little over $2 billion. That does not include this year's deficit, which could bring the amount up to near $15 billion.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table showing the complete record of both Republican and Democratic Parties.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Source: 1957 Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, pp. 336-339.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, as the Senator from Texas himself has said, I do not think it makes any difference which political party talks the loudest about cutting the budget. It is what is actually done by a party when in power that counts. The record shows that in the last 26 years when it was in power, the Democratic Party spent $265 billion more than it took in.

That startling fact stands unchallenged.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has demonstrated how partisanship can be brought into the debate. I have no objection. If the Senator wants to go back to 1900, or even to 1800, that is all right with me. I have never maintained that the Republican Party was not concerned with dollars. I think they are. I have never indicted the Republican Party for creating a deficit by themselves, or for creating a surplus.

I have said that Congress as an institution, over a period of 6 years, has reduced the amounts in appropriation bills. I have expressed the hope that we will do the same thing in the year ahead of us.

If anyone wishes to go back to 1900, he is perfectly willing to do so. He can go back and discuss McKinley and high-button shoes and many other things which happened in those days. He can even talk about Eugene Debs. But I am not interested in getting into that kind of discussion.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I heard the Senator from Texas tell the story of my former colleague, the late Vice President Barkley, about the cuckoo clock. I must say, with all deference to my late friend, and the friend of all of us, that I am certain no one in my State could ever be so confused, except, perhaps, by today's debate in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, he has repeated the point I attempted to make, namely, that I thought a good deal of confusion would result from dragging in the cuts in authorizations, the vetoes, the amounts which might have been introduced, and the amounts which were introduced. I think that was the purpose of it.

Mr. COOPER. I think that anyone who has heard the debate or who will read the RECORD will know that it is a political debate and will look upon it with suspicion.

Perhaps my suggestion may seem elementary. I believe the debate can be resolved by determining the recommendations which the President made both for obligational authority and actual expenditures; and the action the Congress took in both fields, and then see what the result is. That is my comment on budget debate in past years.

Now I direct my remarks to the present. I do so because we are dealing with today's issues and because I believe the majority leader is a man of responsibility and a patriot.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. The President has submitted a budget of $77 billion. Some of those on the other side of the aisle have said today that, if it is not political, it is unrealistic. What they are saying is that the budget will not be balanced, even if all the President's recommendations shall be accepted. That is what they are saying.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; I do not know of anyone on this side of the aisle who has said that.

Mr. COOPER. I do not say that the majority leader said it. But the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] suggested it, as did the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. If what they say is true—that it cannot be balanced—then it calls for even greater responsibility upon the part of Congress. I must say that the responsibility will devolve chiefly upon the majority, because the Democratic Party is in power.

During the debate upon the two bills upon which the Senate voted recently, amendments were offered, the housing and the airport bill, on our side, but they they had no chance against the majority side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Kentucky was a Member of the Senate in the 1st session of the 85th Congress. Does he not recall that there was a yea-and-nay vote on every appropriation bill in that session, and that, with very few exceptions, the votes were unanimous?

Mr. COOPER. Yes. I am speaking of today and I am saying that the Democratic Party is in power, and responsibility falls on it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let us live up to our responsibility. The Senator's party needs advice. If he would simply confine his advice to the Members of his own party——

Mr. COOPER. I am speaking to the Senator from Texas, because I believe he is a man of responsibility. When the housing bill was before the Senate, the Senator from Texas himself urged a reduction in expenditures proposed in the bill. He said he believed the amounts in the bill could be reduced. I think that was a proper exercise of responsibility.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator will recall that in the 85th Congress that was done time and time again on practically every bill.

Mr. COOPER. A few days ago, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] made an excellent speech, one which has been noted in the country, upon the tremendous problem and possible danger which the United States is facing in regard to Berlin. That brings up the question of defense. The Senator from Texas has been laboring hard in the vineyard to find out what we should do about defense—whether the funds proposed in the budget are sufficient.

I suggest to the Senator from Texas that before we launch into all other kinds of expenditures for things which we may desire, but may be able to postpone, that we decide what we need for defense.

Since the Senator from Texas is a responsible man, I ask him in all sincerity, Why would it not be possible for him to bring before the Senate the primary issue—what we need in the field of defense? Then we will be able to decide whether we can have all the other things, too, that are being proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think the Senator has asked a very good question.

Mr. COOPER. I hope the Senator will take this action. All of us would feel more responsible and responsibility could be fixed on our parties, if we knew what the necessities of the country in defense were, and had made fast provision for defense.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that is a very constructive suggestion. The Senator from Kentucky is always constructive, as I have observed through the years.

The appropriate committees of the Senate have been conducting hearings in an attempt to ascertain the facts and to ascertain what is needed. They have heard from the highest authorities in the executive branch of the Government. The Defense Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee has been holding hearings, day in and day out, in an attempt to determine whether the President's budget for the Defense Department should be increased or should be reduced. I am sure that committee will make a report as early as possible, consistent with obtaining all the facts.

We have had a series of hearings, both morning and afternoon, at which we have heard from almost everyone concerned, beginning with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Secretary of Defense, and those who represent the Space Agency.

Tomorrow morning the Space Committee will hold a meeting, at which it will appoint subcommittees to go into all the authorization requests the administration has made.

So I will say to the Senator that since this is early in February, I cannot give him any definite date. But, judging by my experience, at this time we are further along with the studies of this type, in this field, than we normally are; and I am encouraged by the fact—and, as the Senator from Kentucky knows, the Senate must wait for the House of Representatives to act first on appropriation matters—that Secretary McElroy or some of his agents had published in the newspapers, the other day, a story about the number of hours he had testified before congressional committees; and I observed that a considerable part of that time was before the Appropriations Committees.

So I hope we shall be able to comply in spirit, at least, with the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. GORE. In order to set the record straight—as the senior Senator from Delaware said he wished to do—let me state that what I was referring to was, not the expenditure budget, but the actual outgo, as compared with the President's estimates. I shall be glad again to read the figures into the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. There is no dispute about them.

Mr. GORE. There seems to have been some dispute.

For the fiscal year 1956, the President's original estimate amounted to $62,400 million. The actual result was, not $62,400 million, or any lesser amount, but, rather, $66,500 million, or an increase of $4,100 million over the estimate.

For the fiscal year 1957, the President's original estimate was $65,100 million. The actual result again was, not a lesser amount, but a larger one—namely, $69,400 million, or $4,300 million over the estimate.

For the fiscal year 1958 the President's original estimate was $71,800 million. Again, the actual result was an increase—this time, a small increase of $100 million.

For the present fiscal year, the President's original estimate was $73,900 million. The latest figures show the actual result to be $80,900 million. But according to the estimates of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], when the fiscal year closes there will be a deficit of approximately $12 billion or $13 billion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I am not disputing those figures, Mr. President. The Senator placed them in the RECORD the other day; and I said then that I thought those figures were correct. I did not question them. I said I recognized that the Congress had cut some of the appropriation items. But I understood the Senator from Tennessee to say the budget had not been balanced.

Of course, in balancing the budget, the items of income are placed in juxtaposition to the items of expenditure. But that has nothing to do with authorizations. The expenditures show the amounts spent this year, as a result of authorizations made, whether made last year or the year before that or as long as 10 years ago.

I was not taking exception to the figures the Senator placed in the RECORD. I understood him to say at the time that the budget was not balanced during those 3 or 4 years. I said that if the Senator made that statement, he was in error.

On the other hand, we are in complete agreement as to the figures he submitted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I think the two Senators have misunderstood each other.

Mr. GORE. Then I wish to correct the RECORD by saying that evidently I misunderstood the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I have said that several times.

But again I say the RECORD shows that the budget was balanced 2 years before.

I say that we shall have a deficit this year.

I repeat that I think Senators on both sides of the aisle can, if they wish, do a great deal of boasting about who was responsible for one appropriation item or another; but the fact is that both sides could have done better if they had tried; and I think the American people wish we had, because during the past number of years the deficit has been built up to $280 billion, as the result of the expenditures the Congress has made.

It is unfortunate that there were any deficits at all. However, I repeat that during the 33 years of Republican administrations, there were deficits in only 11 years; whereas during the 26 years of Democratic administrations, there were deficits in 23 years.

However, Mr. President, talk will not get us anywhere. Instead of talking, let us cut down this budget, so the Government will be able to live within its income.

I do not think there is anything sacred about a Presidential budget which is sent to the Congress. I believe the Government must live within its income, regardless of the political-party allegiance of the President who sends the budget to the Congress.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield. In fact, Mr. President, I should like to yield the floor. However, at this time I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. A few minutes ago our friend referred to the $335 million of Federal National Mortgage Association mortgages; and the Senator from Connecticut undertook to speak about the status of that item.

Inasmuch as I have been joined by the Senator from Tennessee in suggesting that the President's budget for the fiscal year 1960 was not actually balanced in accordance with good accounting procedure, I should like to make this brief statement for the RECORD: The $335 million of Federal National Mortgage Association mortgages is a capital asset of the Government which, if held to maturity, will be paid off in full. In order to obtain revenue sufficient to show a balanced budget, it is proposed that those mortgages be sold—probably at a discount. The Government will lose if it sells them; and it is not good accounting procedure to sell a capital asset in order to balance an operating budget. I think that is as plain as the nose on one's face.

I thank the Senator from Texas for yielding to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for his statement.

Mr. President, I wish to conclude—and then I shall yield the floor—by saying that I think the debate today has been a very helpful one. I believe the Senate has been informed, and I believe the country will be informed.

I listened with great interest to what was said by my friend, the Senator from Illinois, who always is polite and courteous and thorough. The only objection I have to his statement is that he included authorizations and a number of vetoed items and other matters which were not included in my original statement.

I am glad we still can disagree on matters, even including the budget, without being disagreeable. I have enjoyed the discussion.

Mr. President, at this time I yield the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, before turning to the few matters which I shall discuss briefly, I desire to make a brief comment on the debate had this afternoon on the issue of balancing the budget. At every opportunity that I have to make this comment, I shall make it, in the hope that perhaps eventually some heed will be given to the recommendations of those in this country who I think are unquestionably our greatest experts on budgets. I mentioned them briefly the other day. I refer to the recommendations of the great industrialists of this country who are members of the Committee for Economic Development—most of them Republicans.

I am always surprised when I listen to my Republican colleagues in the Senate talk about the budget issue; for from their side of the aisle we get no comment about a capital budget. One would think that those Republicans in the Senate who are so concerned about this issue of a balanced budget would have joined some of us on this side of the aisle in support of a capital budget bill which would present the information to the American people about national facts.

The arguments by way of subjectivity that were heard on the Republican side of the aisle today are rather surprising. If anybody questions the President on anything, one or two of my Republican colleagues jump up and talk about the President's sincerity. Well, that is a very subjective term. I like to talk about his judgment or lack of it; and it is his lack of judgment on many issues which ought to be considered the basis for fair debate in the Senate.

PRESIDENT SHOULD STUDY UP ON CAPITAL BUDGETING

On the budget issue, the President is again showing his gross lack of information or understanding. If he had some understanding of the budget problem, we would hear something from him that would present the facts about expenditures to the American people, which it is necessary to do when we talk about a capital budget.

Sometimes I wonder whether the President knows the difference between a capital budget and the kind of budget he recommends to the Congress. I sometimes wonder if he knows that American industry and business is conducted on the basis of a capital budget, and not on the kind of budget that he is talking about balancing, one which lumps together administrative costs of Government and capital investments. The fact that business uses a capital budget should impress the President with the idea that it may have some virtues for the Nation, too.

I am at a complete loss to understand why my Republican friends, particularly my good friend from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is now present in the Chamber, and who is one of the great authorities here in the Senate on all fiscal matters, does not support a capital budget. He knows whereof I speak when I point out that the Committee on Economic Development, which is composed of great financiers, industrialists, and businessmen of this country, are dead right when they recommend, as they have since 1947, the setting up of a capital budget, which would present to the American people for the first time the facts about the fiscal condition of Uncle Sam.

When one takes into account the expenditures by the American people for capital investment—the revenue-producing, profitmaking capital investments of the Federal Government—which should never be carried as a part of the operating expense budget, then it becomes clear to the American people that all this talk about balancing a budget is empty politics—just empty politics.

Mr. President, I have no intention of voting, under the catchy label of "a balanced budget," against investing Federal funds in capital improvements necessary to promote the economic welfare of the American people. When we invest in such projects, we are not unbalancing a true budget. When we sit in this session of the Senate, as I hope we shall, and vote to override the President of the United States in his "knifing" of some needed capital investments so essential to improve the economic welfare of our people, we shall be strengthening the fiscal condition of this Government, and not weakening it. I shall soon have my capital budget bill ready again; it is now being perfected by fiscal experts. When I reintroduce it again in the not too distant future, Mr. President, I shall be presenting a proposal for a budget which will strengthen the fiscal condition of this country. I will not be joining with the President of the United States, but I will be voting against him, as he attempts to postpone appropriations for the needed developments in our country which are so essential if we are going to maintain a strong economy.

It is difficult to understand a President of the United States who thinks, for example, that we are helping the fiscal condition of this country by making recommendations which will hold back further the development of the energy resources of America. This civilization of ours is going to climb on the energy we produce, not on the energy Dwight D. Eisenhower prevents us from producing. Our civilization is going to climb on an expanding economy. We are not going to feed any flames of inflation, Mr. President, by appropriations of that type.

I will tell Senators what is likely to happen to us. If we follow the fiscal recommendations of the President of the United States, unemployment is going to increase again, because we are already beginning to see that in connection with a subject matter I shall discuss shortly. We are a long way from solving the problems of the recession.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Oregon a question concerning a statement he has made regarding the preparation of a bill in the form of a capital budget. I have read, not only recently, but for many years, the very strong position taken by the distinguished Senator from Oregon about the capital budget theory. It is a very appealing matter to the junior Senator from Colorado.

As I listened to this very learned discussion, I wondered whether it would be possible to translate the President's present budget into a capital budget, to give us an idea of what would be involved.

Mr. MORSE. It would be easy to do so, and we will do it when the bill is presented and when we present the argument in support of the bill. We can take from the President's budget the capital investment items, putting on those items the capital investment label. The President now includes those items in his combined budget, carrying them as operating costs. When we consider the capital investments, we can easily see that Uncle Sam's budget is in fact not out of balance. This is a matter of definition, as to whether the budget is balanced or whether the budget is not balanced.

What do we mean when we say "balanced"? Do we mean we should include the cost of Grand Coulee as an operating expense, and have a balanced budget, or that we should take out those expenditures that will be repaid and set them aside in a capital investment budget, when we are considering a balanced or unbalanced budget?

Some of this is nonsense. The fact is that the President has added up two columns of figures, and he is frightening the American people into believing that because those columns do not come out even, as the Congress has been appropriating the money, we have an unbalanced budget. The President knows the average citizen is not going to put to himself questions dealing with such abstractions as "Well, what is included in the budget? Does the budget include capital, revenue-producing investments?"

The answer is "Yes."

When one looks at the budget from that the standpoint instead of using the President's major thesis, then the budget looks quite different. When one takes out the capital investments and looks at them as revenue-producing assets, as wealth belonging to the American people, the budget does not look bad at all, in terms of "balance." It would look bad, however, in that it provides so little for capital investments, compared to what is needed.

I was interested in the remarks made this afternoon by the Senator from Connecticut about the FHA mortgages. The Senator said that, after all, those were taxpayers' dollars which were invested in the mortgages. Those are not lost dollars. We have not burned up the greenbacks which went into those mortgages. Those mortgages are wealth belonging to all the American people. Why do we talk about those things as though they were liabilities?

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. The Senator, then, would distinguish between those appropriations and that type of Government money which is spent, for example, for the military for items which may become obsolete, and that type of Government money which is spent to increase the wealth of the Nation.

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to reduce it to a very simple example. Let the RECORD show that I do not carry this argument by analogy too far, but it will illustrate my point.

Let us consider as an example the household budget of the Senator from Colorado. Let us assume that when the Senator makes his annual bookkeeping account he finds that he has a vacant lot in Boulder, Colo.; that he has $10,000 in bonds in a safety deposit box in a Denver bank; and that he has a farm in southeast Colorado. How would the Senator include those items on his books? He would include them as capital investment assets. That is what the FHA mortgages are, so far as Uncle Sam's books are concerned. That is what Grand Coulee, Bonneville, McNary, and all the other great dams are.

We ought to consider these items as separate and distinct items. That is what the Committee for Economic Development has been telling us ever since 1947, in its proposal for a capital budget. That is what the first Hoover Commission told us to do. We ought to consider these things separately from the problem of balancing administrative costs of the Government against income. It is that simple, and every corporation in America does it. But the Federal Government does not.

This practice is not limited to the Republican administration. I was pleading for a capital budget when we had a Democratic administration.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MORSE. I yield further.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to ask another question for information, because I think this can be developed into a very interesting discussion. I asked if we could have a capital investment budget on a comparative basis with the President's budget, because I read in the RECORD the other day, I believe, that many municipalities have capital investment budgets.

Mr. MORSE. Yes. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] pointed out in our colloquy the other day, that the Federal Government has not done nearly so well as many cities in this country in the setting up of business-like budgets. When one considers the budget account of a city one gets a much more—I was about to say "honest" but I will say "accurate"—accurate presentation of the fiscal facts than one gets from the Federal budget. All I am requesting, in urging the adoption of a capital budget, is that we set up our budget in a form so that the American people will really see, when they take a look at the budget, what are the assets and what are the liabilities.

Mr. CARROLL. If the Senator will yield further, I should like to continue searching for information, because I have followed the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Oregon on this matter for many years.

Why would the Democrats not adopt such a system? What is the reason both administrations have failed to follow the recommendations of the Committee for Economic Development?

Mr. MORSE. I cannot give the Senator the reason. I do not know the reason. I will give the Senator my surmise.

In the administration of the Federal Government we are creatures of habit. It is very difficult to change old habits. We have done our national budgeting this way so long that there does not seem to be very much interest in changing it. I think the Senator observes the same is true with regard to many things connected with the operation of the Senate. Can the Senator give me any reason for a lot of rules which we have and under which we keep operating? We are creatures of habit about these things.

Could anyone really justify the meeting hours of the Senate before the Committee on Rules and Administration? Can they possibly be justified on the basis of efficiency? We begin our sessions at 12 o'clock noon with half a dozen Senators present. During the next 2 hours we eat in relays. There is no orderly, businesslike procedure for transacting the business of the Senate. We like to think there is. If we were to bring in some high school seniors as judges, we would flunk the test of efficiency in Senate procedure.

For many years I have proposed that in the early part of each session the Senate should begin its sessions from Monday to Thursday at 9 o'clock a.m., continuing until 12:30, with a recess, resuming at 2 o'clock and continuing until 5. I have advocated a rule of germaneness during those hours. Beginning at 5 o'clock we could do our so-called chore work and discuss any item other than the business before the Senate.

Let any Senator make that proposal, and see how many votes he gets. Yet that is the only common sense, orderly procedure for any parliamentary body.

People sit in the galleries and cannot understand the slipshod, inefficient manner in which the Senate conducts its business. It is wasteful. I cannot explain why the Senate does so, except that we are creatures of habit and historic tradition, but that is not efficiency. I make the same explanation as to why for years, Democratic and Republican administrations alike have not followed the recommendations of the experts on budget making.

Mr. CARROLL. Have not the Treasury Department and the other agencies of Government heard of the requests from the Committee for Economic Development? Has any administration, Democratic or Republican, ever given reasons for not following this sensible system of budgeting?

Mr. MORSE. The nearest approach we have made has been recommendations for study.

Mr. CARROLL. And that study has been in progress over 10 years, has it not?

Mr. MORSE. The Committee for Economic Development completed its study several years ago. So did the first Hoover Commission. I think we should act on the recommendations.

Mr. CARROLL. Is that committee still in existence?

Mr. MORSE. Yes. Of course it works on a great many other problems.

Mr. CARROLL. Do the recommendations still stand?

Mr. MORSE. The first such proposal was made in 1947, when Paul Hoffman was Chairman. I brought the recommendations to the floor of the Senate in 1947 and offered them. That was one of the recommendations.

In my judgment the Committee for Economic Development has done a magnificent job in the field of taxation over the years. I believe the tax reports of the Committee for Economic Development are among the best that have been made available to us. We did not follow many of the Committee's recommendations.

I believe the Committee for Economic Development was very helpful to the Hoover Commission, in bringing about the adoption of some of its recommendations.

It is my hope that my bill and my speech on the capital budget will be ready in about 2 weeks. I shall give the Senator advance notice, because I should like to have him present during the discussion. Knowing him as I do, I shall be very much surprised if I do not find him among my partners in the endeavor to have this recommendation adopted.

Mr. CARROLL. I shall follow the subject with a great deal of attention. I know that we need some constructive thinking in this field, and I hope we can effectuate a change. I believe it would be in the public interest.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. President, I now turn to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

MINIMUM WAGE AMENDMENTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I join with my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] in cosponsoring the legislation he has introduced which will make certain amendments and improvements to the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. In doing so, it is my profound hope that under his leadership this long overdue measure, so desperately needed, will at last become law.

It is not the first time I have advocated such changes which I deem to be so necessary for the well-being of the lowest paid American citizens and for the stability and health of our national economy. Both in 1958 and in 1957 I joined with other of my distinguished colleagues in introducing such legislation. Last year, in a speech before this body on May 1, I noted that we were confronted with two inescapable facts—a major recession and an unimaginative leadership. We are today confronted with no appreciable improvement in either of these two conditions. The financial pages of our newspapers have only recently described the slowness with which the Nation's economy is recovering from its low point of last year. In many States, large numbers of unemployed remain as a challenge to the ingenuity of our free economic system and illustrate a tragic waste of human resources.

As I said last year, the President's program is limited to a plea for salesmen to sell harder and for the consumers to buy what they cannot afford. In its plea for a so-called balanced budget without regard to consequences, the administration has gone even further than before in its failure to supply leadership in the midst of what continues to be, for multitudes of people, a serious recession.

One way to speed our recovery is to build up the purchasing power of the consumer. Confidence, not only to the consumer, but also for the businessman, large and small, depends upon such restored purchasing power. This calls for immediate action—not McKinley economic policy.

Whenever we fail to guarantee the worker a minimum wage, we risk the possibility of denying him the necessary purchasing power to satisfy his own needs, and those of the economy. By permitting employers the opportunity to pay substandard wages we encourage them, in fact, to do so. By paying substandard wages, the employer weakens the ability of his employee to buy his neighbors goods and services, to pay for better schools, to acquire living space so that his family may grow up in human dignity. Not only is the employee unable to meet a minimum standard of living, but in turn, his neighbor, from whom he buys, becomes unable to purchase. Thus, the vicious cycle of depression starts and runs its course. Once a recession gets underway, great pressure is placed upon the employer to lower his wages. Shrinking markets mean layoffs and reduced wages for employees.

To meet these conditions, the legislation which we introduce today establishes a floor below which the free run of economic forces is unable to force the further exploitation of low-wage workers. The more people are covered by minimum wage laws, the less is the temptation and the necessity for lower rates.

Perhaps even more important than the raising of the present minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 is the necessity to extend minimum wage coverage to large numbers of hitherto exempt wage earners. It strikes me just as unbelievable as it did last year, that more than a million retail and service workers make less than a dollar an hour. Indeed, that a hundred thousand of them make less than 75 cents an hour is astounding. I wonder how many of us, or indeed anybody we know of, could support a family, indeed even one person, on such remuneration.

Senator KENNEDY has made note of the fact that we will come to grips with the problems facing agricultural employees in separate bills. The farm labor problem, as he says, presents many special complexities but, nonetheless, it is our determined intention to press forward with legislation in aid of the farm employee with as much sense of urgency as that which we will expend in behalf of the bill we are introducing today.

MIGRANT WORKERS NEED ATTENTION

I digress to say that while sitting here chatting with my good friend from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], we were talking about the need for special legislation to come to grips with the agricultural employee problem, particularly the problem of the migrant worker. Some of us attended the meeting at the Mayflower Hotel the other night, and listened to a discussion of the migrant workers' problem. Conditions are so sad and shocking that I am satisfied that if we could get the facts out to the farm population of the country, we would find a resounding rejection of any idea that such conditions should be permitted to continue.

Of course what is actually happening is that we are asking the migrant workers to be the contributors to a subsidy by working for less than a decent wage, and living, in many areas, under living conditions which are so deplorable that they can be characterized only as truly un-American.

Therefore I believe the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY] hit the nail on the head when, in conversation with me this afternoon—and I am sure he will not object to my saying it on the floor—he said that at one time, when he was a Member of the House, he suggested we ought to have some legislation which would guarantee at least 90 percent of the minimum wage being paid in every area of agriculture where there was an advocacy of 90 percent of parity.

He could not have stated the matter more clearly. Of course I am in favor of 100 percent of parity so far as the application of the minimum wage is concerned. I know of no good reason why the minimum wage should not be applied to people who produce the food of this Nation, the same as it is applied to those who produce any other consumer goods.

As I said, I recognize the complexities of this problem and the necessity of dealing with it in specific legislation. In making my statement today, I wish to serve notice that I shall participate in the introduction of separate legislation in the field of minimum wages for agricultural employees.

There is just one observation I should like to add to those offered by my colleague from Massachusetts. I have heard much from certain quarters about the terrible danger of inflation. In particular, we have been told that labor should exercise restraint in seeking higher earnings. I would be most impressed by these pronouncements if they were accompanied by some evidence of concern for employees. Indeed, every Member of this Senate would deplore wages that are substandard and conditions of living that are below standards of decency. The time has come, I believe, to proceed promptly to correct wage inequities now suffered by millions of our fellow Americans.

I deem it a high honor and privilege to join the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] in cosponsoring the bill which he has introduced on behalf of the two of us, and which is being introduced in the House by that very fine Representative, JAMES ROOSEVELT.

I now turn to another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

THE OATH AND AFFIDAVIT PROVISIONS OF THE NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, shortly after the National Defense Education Act became law last year, I received from the American Association of University Professors, as did all members of the Senate committee, a detailed explanation of why that organization opposes the loyalty affidavit provision of the act. That provision was added to the bill on the floor of the Senate by a floor amendment.

This provision is section 1001(f)(1) in title X of the National Defense Education Act. It provides that no funds "shall be used to make payments or loans to any individual unless such individual, first, has executed and filed with the Commissioner an affidavit that he does not believe in, and is not a member of and does not support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods."

Last December, I asked the staff of the Senate Labor Committee to prepare a memorandum on the subject of this provision, discussing the need for it. I also asked that the memorandum include the pertinent information on where else in Federal law such affidavits are required, or where an oath of allegiance or information about membership in such organizations described is required as a condition of doing business with the Government or receiving some benefits from the Government.

I pointed out to the AAUP that public officeholders, for example, must take an oath to uphold the Constitution, and information about activities in subversive organizations is requested of applicants for Federal jobs.

The AAUP then indicated that it has no objection to the affirmative oath of allegiance contained in the National Defense Education Act in section 1001(f)(2).

A few days ago, Reed College, in Portland, Oreg., turned down its grant of money for its student loan fund because its administrators object to the affidavit requirement.

The loss of the $3,349 allocation to Reed College for student loans means a great deal to that institution. I know the decision was not taken lightly or easily. Nonetheless, this school has stood up for a principle.

It is my earnest hope that the Education Subcommittee of the Senate Labor Committee will act soon on S. 819, introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] repealing the affidavit requirement in this act. It is quite possible that neither the oath nor the affidavit is desirable in the act. Certainly the affidavit is not.

I hope the information I have requested be furnished to the committee members by the staff will give us the background on the whole subject, so we can proceed to consider the bill. It is important that a school like Reed College not be penalized any longer for standing up for a principle.

I ask consent to have printed at this point an editorial from the Eugene (Oreg.) Register-Guard of February 4, entitled "Reed College and a High Principle," and editorials from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Medford Mail-Tribune.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Eugene (Oreg.) Register-Guard, Feb. 4, 1959]

REED COLLEGE AND A HIGH PRINCIPLE

Reed College, through its president, Richard H. Sullivan, has turned down a $3,349 grant from the Federal Government. The scholarship money, made available through the National Defense Educaton Act, is forthcoming only if beneficiaries of this largess sign loyalty oaths. Reed's president says he turned down the money because "singling out teachers and students as people not to be trusted gets under my skin."

Good for Reed. Perhaps this action will call attention to Senate bill 819, introduced by JOHN KENNEDY, of Massachusetts. This measure would remove the loyalty-oath requirement from the act. It has the support of numerous Senators, including RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, of Oregon.

The idea of the loyalty oath is a direct slap at the intellectual community. It is a hangover from the "know-nothingism" that swept America before the Civil War and that recurs periodically in the form of Ku Kluxism or McCarthyism. The target in all cases is the educated man.

We do not think it can be shown that a loyalty oath has ever, ever been used to trap a spy. Any spy worth his rubles will sign anything if his signature will help him in his dirty business. Those who refuse to sign have been persons of principle who objected to being singled out as unduly suspect because of their professions. If refusal to sign is taken as an admission of guilt—a "fifth-amendment Communist" kind of thinking—are we to believe that any really subversive person would refuse?

The scholarship program that Reed will not be a part of costs the Federal Government $250 million a year. It is small potatoes, indeed, compared with the farm-subsidy program, which costs nearly $5 billion a year. Yet those who receive money under the subsidy program, 18 times as costly as the scholarship program, are not asked to sign loyalty oaths. For all that subversion on the farm is not a common problem, it is just as true that it is no great problem in the colleges and universities.

Oregon, alone among the States on the coast, has never required a loyalty oath of its professors. This is due in part to the intensive lobbying in legislative halls in 1951 by W. M. Tugman, former editor of this newspaper; Charles A. Sprague, editor of the Oregon Statesman; and State Representative Earl Hill. All are Republicans. They were joined by Democrats like Maurine Neuberger and Robert Holmes. It was a tough battle, fought in a year when McCarthyism was riding high. They found support for loyalty oaths in surprising places, but they persevered and they won.

It is fitting that Reed, an Oregon college which is badly in need of all the money it can get, holds firm to the high principle.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Feb. 5, 1959]

AN OATH THAT HURTS THE NATION

Reed College in Portland, Oreg., one of the better small colleges, has refused to accept money under the National Defense Education Act because a loyalty oath is demanded of those receiving grants or loans. This positive action follows appeals by the presidents of Harvard, Yale, and Princeton for repeal of the oath provision. The Association of American Colleges meanwhile is polling its 750 members on the question.

Such oaths, said President Griswold of Yale, "seem to represent a lack of confidence in young people and in their future, as well as in the educational process itself. They tend to alienate the good will of the loyal citizens without gaining a corresponding advantage in protecting the public against the actions or intentions of the disloyal."

More concretely, the oath requirement is preventing the use of a good part of the $900 million made available under the legislation, and thus it is delaying the training of the scientists, mathematicians and linguists needed in the defense of the Nation. After all, this law was not passed merely to aid education, but to make educated persons available for national service. Without repeal of the oath requirement, it is partly self-defeating.

[From the Medford Mail-Tribune, Feb. 8, 1959]

OBJECTIONABLE LOYALTY OATH

Most Americans are patriotic, and completely dedicated to the welfare of their nation. They abhor this Nation's enemies. And many of them cannot understand why anyone would object to taking a so-called loyalty oath.

They, in their patriotic fervor, would be willing to raise their right hands and swear that they never have, do not now, and never will, advocate the forceful or illegal overthrow of the U.S. Government.

And they can't understand why anyone else would.

Let's look at it this way:

If they were applying for a job, and one of the conditions of employment was that they swear they had never beaten a small child to death, and will never do so, they'd probably be mad as hops.

"What kind of a stinking bum do you think I am?" would be their rejoinder, as they stalked off in search of a job where they could hold up their heads in pride and dignity.

It is for very similar reasons that the teaching profession feels discriminated against when asked to take such a negative loyalty oath.

They have no objection to a positive oath—one in which they declare they will uphold and support the Constitution and the laws and the ideals of the Nation.

One of the most lucid explanations of this situation we have seen was in a recent editorial in the Eugene Register-Guard, which said:

"The idea of the loyalty oath is a direct slap at the intellectual community. It is a hangover from the 'Know-Nothingism' that swept America before the Civil War and that recurs periodically in the form of Ku Kluxism or McCarthyism. The target, in all cases, is the educated man.

"We do not think it can be shown that a loyalty oath has ever, ever, been used to trap a spy. Any spy worth his rubles will sign anything if his signature will help him in his dirty business. Those who refuse to sign have been persons of principle who objected to being singled out as unduly suspect because of their professions. If refusal to sign is taken as an admission of guilt—a fifth amendment Communist kind of thinking—are we to believe that any really subversive person would refuse?"

The president of Reed College, Richard H. Sullivan, recently announced the college would turn down a $3,349 grant from the Federal Government for scholarships, because of the fact that beneficiaries must take a form of the negative and discriminatory loyalty oath.

Dr. Sullivan objected because "singling out teachers and students as people not to be trusted gets under my skin."

The objections can be summed up in two points:

1. It is useless.
2. It is a gratuitous insult to an honorable profession.

That is why teachers object to it, and we think they are right.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also ask consent to have appear at this point my radio broadcast to Oregon of February 10, in which I touched on this point; and letters I have received from the President of Oberlin College, the dean of the Liberal Arts College of the University of Oregon, the faculty of Lewis and Clark College in Oregon, the American Association of University Professors, and the Oregon chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO BROADCAST OF SENATOR MORSE, FEBRUARY 10, 1959

Fellow Oregonians, before taking a brief recess for the Lincoln and Washington birthday holidays, the Senate concluded work on a very important piece of legislation. This was the housing bill, a bill like the one the Senate passed last year and which was lost in the House of Representatives largely because of the administration's opposition to it. I was a cosponsor of the bill and, because it is so important to Oregon, I would like to discuss it briefly on this broadcast.

Briefly, here is what the new Housing Act of 1959 provided: First, it revitalized the veterans' housing program. Under it, $150 million was added to the revolving fund for direct loans to veterans for homes. We had figures from the Veterans' Administration showing a tremendous backlog of applications for direct loans that could not be granted because the money had run out. The bill as introduced provided a fund of $300 million for that purpose because that is the amount the Veterans' Administration says is needed to take care of this backlog. But the cry of "economy" from the administration carried the day for the forces that wanted to cut in half the veterans' direct-loan program. They reduced it to $150 million. I very much regret the adoption of that administration amendment, and I am hopeful that, since the House of Representatives provided the necessary $300 million for veterans' loans, most of it can be retained in the final bill.

These veterans' loans are primarily for those veterans living in rural or small town areas where credit for home loans is not readily available. It is of vital importance to States like Oregon, and to our veterans, that funds be available for home loans regardless of the area in which the veteran happens to live.

I might point out that these direct loans are above and beyond the regular private loans to veterans that are only insured by the Veterans' Administration. This important program continues as before, except in one important respect, and that is the interest rate.

The private sources of money for housing loans have been on what amounts to a financial strike against veterans for the simple reason that the interest rate was fixed by law, and they could get a higher interest rate by lending to nonveterans. As the people of Oregon well know, I have fought at every opportunity against the administration policy of raising interest rates. Higher interest rates were largely responsible for the decline in housing starts; they priced homes out of the market, so to speak. The cost of borrowing the money to build became so high, so many families who wanted and needed new homes put off the decision to build.

We did succeed for a time in holding the line on the interest rate that could be charged to veterans. But eventually lenders simply stopped lending to veterans. That unfortunate situation was remedied only in part by the direct Government loans, because these were available only in rural areas. This year, the hue and cry for higher interest rates on veterans' loans was louder than ever. And by the time the bill had passed the Senate, the rate was raised from 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent.

I am proud to say that once again I was among those who cosponsored the amendment to leave the interest rate where it was. I do not believe in giving in to this kind of political blackmail on the part of moneylenders and the administration. Every time Congress has given in on the subject of interest rates for one particular type of loan, it has merely increased the pressure to raise rates all the way around, both of private and public financial transactions. Had our amendment to hold the line on veterans interest rates prevailed, we would then have required that mortgages at that rate be supported at par by the Government.

That would have held the line on inflationary interest rates, and assured the veterans of a source of loans, as well.

We lost on that round, and that was one deficiency in the bill, in my opinion.

But weighted against it are the continuation of loans to veterans, and the extension of the Federal Housing, or FHA loan guarantees. The authority of FHA to guarantee nonveteran loans had run out, and in this measure we authorized the FHA to guarantee an additional $5 billion worth of home loans in fiscal 1959, and another $5 billion worth in 1960. This does not mean the Government is putting up the money. It is only insuring loans totaling that amount.

At the same time, we extended and improved the loans for property improvement. This is the program that enables American families to borrow money to repair or modernize their homes. A great deal of construction work has been made possible under this program, and it is important that it be continued.

These were the major provisions in the housing bill. Although I believed the bill should have gone further in providing for slum clearance and public housing in our great cities, it will certainly have a stimulating effect upon the lumber industry.

In the committee hearings on this measure, it was estimated that if the bill were enacted into law before the spring construction season begins, it could increase the number of housing starts this year by 200,000. That would bring the annual rate to 1,400,000 new homes.

It was also estimated that half a million new jobs would be created by the bill. A great many of these new jobs would, of course, be in the lumber industry.

That is why I cosponsored this legislation even though I believe it had some defects. Its overall impact upon Oregon and the construction industry will be good. It could have been better, but faced with so much opposition from the administration, it is a pretty good housing bill.

I took the time to discuss it today because it came before the Senate just at the time when unemployment in Oregon was the highest in the Nation. For the first week of 1959, the rate of unemployment across the Nation was 6.2 percent; but in Oregon it was 10.4 percent. For the following week, the national average of working people drawing their unemployment compensation was 6 percent; in Oregon it was 9.8 percent.

This high rate of unemployment, is, of course, in large part seasonal. It reflects directly the winter slowdown in lumber. But it also reflects the fact that our State is tied very closely to the lumber industry.

It is also important to bear in mind that as home construction has revived and the lumber industry has returned to the levels of production of 2 and 3 years ago, employment has not picked up at the same rate.

The lumber industry, in Oregon and elsewhere, is finding ways of turning out the same amount of lumber without rehiring all the people it laid off during hard times. I do not fool myself into thinking that this housing bill will solve the unemployment problem for Oregon. It will help; but it will not do the whole job.

We must continue to renew our efforts to diversify the industry of our State and of the entire Pacific Northwest. In addition to lumber, we must develop our other great natural resources, that of low-cost water power.

Cheap power is a great attraction to new industry, and it is one we must take more advantage of than we have to date. New industry using low-cost power can bring new payrolls to Oregon, and relieve our dependence upon lumber for prosperity and progress.

I pledge my continuing efforts to do whatever is necessary at the Federal level to achieve that goal.

One additional item I wish to mention on this broadcast is one that grew out of the National Defense Education Act passed by the Congress last year. I told this audience about that bill several times last year, and I believe it was a great forward step in meeting this country's obligation to maintain high educational standards, particularly in science and mathematics.

Unfortunately, there was added to this law on the floor of the Senate a provision called the loyalty oath. It required all persons receiving any financial assistance, either by loan or grant, to file with the Commissioner of Education an affidavit that he does not believe in, is not a member of and does not support any organization that believes in or teaches the violent overthrow of the Federal Government.

The American Association of University Professors and the heads of several of the outstanding colleges and universities of the country have denounced this requirement in the law. They point out that they have no objection to an affirmative oath of allegiance of the kind taken by a public official or members of the Armed Forces.

But those who would receive loans or grants under the bill are required to do much more than pledge allegiance to the Government. And as a result, Reed College in Portland has turned down its share of the loan money made available to it under the law. As President Richard Sullivan of Reed College put it, he turned down the money because, and I quote him: "Singling out teachers and students as people not to be trusted gets under my skin."

I am happy to report that legislation is already before the Congress to eliminate this requirement from the law. The Subcommittee on Education of the Senate Labor Committee, of which I am a member, informs me that it expects to take up the matter within a very few days. Several weeks ago, I had asked the staff of the committee to make a study of this provision to determine whether it went beyond the pledges required of others who receive aid from the Federal Government, and whether it was in fact deemed necessary by those responsible for administering the law.

Since then, the administration itself has requested that the "loyalty oath" be removed from the law. I hope this will be done quickly, and I shall urge early consideration of it upon my colleagues on the Labor and Public Welfare Committee of the Senate.

Reed College and the many other fine colleges and universities in Oregon and throughout the country should be able to set up their loan funds just as quickly as possible; they should not be deterred from doing so because of their natural and understandable dislike of taking oaths and signing affidavits of this kind.

There are better and more efficient ways of keeping track of the handful of conspirators in our country than this method of demanding that hundreds of thousands of students, teachers, and school administrators sign this kind of affidavit. I shall be making every effort to get it repealed as soon as possible.

There are a great many other issues I would like to have the time to talk to you about but they will have to be postponed until our next broadcast. I do want to say that I am particularly pleased with the progress that we are making in this session of the Senate. Already we have passed the housing bill, we have passed the airport bill. I had hoped to talk about that today. We are well on our way to the consideration of a labor bill, the education bill is under hearing, and my hearings on the railroad retirement bill of the Labor Committee are about to be completed. I think that the performance of this session of the Congress thus far has just been plain remarkable.

This is WAYNE MORSE reporting to you from Washington, D.C.

OBERLIN COLLEGE,
Oberlin, Ohio, February 6, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: I am writing for the faculty of Oberlin College to express strong opposition to title X, section 1001(f)(1) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which reads:

"No * * * funds * * * shall be used to make payments or loans to any individual unless such individual (1) has executed and filed with the Commissioner an affidavit that he does not believe in, and is not a member of and does not support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods."

Our opposition is not directed against the oath of allegiance (title X, sec. 1001(f)(2)) which the act includes, but only to the foregoing quoted provision which is, in effect, a test oath. Such test oaths have aroused resistance many times before in the course of English and American history. An individual is compelled to make a statement disclaiming objectionable associations and beliefs in order to gain the benefits of the program. In our view this is unnecessary and unreasonable.

The provision of the oath concerning belief is particularly repugnant. We object to the notion that an individual should be penalized because of a mental state where no overt act has occurred. We fail to see how justice can be done in any proceeding to enforce this provision concerning the content of a human mind. We agree heartily with the late Justice Jackson, who said:

"Our forefathers found the evil of free thinking more to be endured than the evils of inquest or suppression. They gave the status of almost absolute individual rights to the outward means of expressing belief. I cannot believe they left open a way for legislation to embarrass or impede the mere mental processes by which those expressions of belief are examined and formulated. This is not only because individual thinking presents no danger to society, but because thoughtful, bold, and independent minds are essential to wise and considered self-government."

Suspicion directed at the students and teachers in our colleges and universities is completely unwarranted. Their understanding of and devotion to freedom and the cause of democracy is not surpassed by any other group in our society. We concur in the statement of Mr. Bentley Glass, president of the American Association of University Professors, who commented on the test oath as follows:

"If an individual refuses to sign, he raises a suspicion that he is unworthy of public trust or benefit. If he signs, he endorses the pertinency of the generally suspicion about him and his kind which it embodies in the requirement."

The stand now taken by the Oberlin faculty against the test oath in the 1958 act is fully in accord with its proudest traditions. In 1952 the faculty unanimously adopted a resolution which included these statements relevant to the present issue:

"Times of crisis present sharp challenges to the professed values of a democratic society. At such times it is tempting to measure all things by the rough standards of unity, loyalty, and orthodoxy. The inevitable tendency is to restrict such fundamentals of democracy as discussion and debate, and even to make divergence of opinion appear dangerous.

"The Oberlin College faculty regards all forms of interference with intellectual freedom, discriminatory loyalty oaths, censorship, and other restrictions on free speech and thought as inimical to the democratic way of life."

In view of the objections and considerations stated above, we earnestly request that the test oath incorporated in title X, section 1001(f)(1) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958 be immediately repealed.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD M. LOVE,
Secretary of the Faculty.

UNIVERSITY OF OREGON,
COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS,
Eugene, Oreg., February 11, 1959.

Senator WAYNE L. MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: The department heads of the College of Liberal Arts at their meeting last week requested that I write to you to ask your support of Senator KENNEDY'S amendment to repeal the negative oath requirement of the National Defense Education Act. As you know, the act contains two provisions respecting the oath: (1) An oath (or affirmation) of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States, and (2) a disclaimer oath that asks recipients of loans or fellowships to declare that they "do not believe in, and are not a member of and do not support any organization that believes in or teaches, the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods."

It is the second of these to which department heads object on the basis that the negative oath is wrong in principle, that it is unnecessary in view of the affirmative oath carried in the act, and that it sets apart and discriminates against a small segment of American people.

May I add that earlier in the week, Dean Charles T. Duncan and I jointly offered a resolution to the faculty in support of the Kennedy amendment. Under our faculty provisions, this resolution will not be acted upon until it has been reviewed by the senate and is presented to the faculty again at its March meeting.

I know that you will understand the position of faculty members on this matter as few other Senators do and I shall, therefore, greatly appreciate your efforts on our behalf.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT D. CLARK, Dean.

LEWIS AND CLARK COLLEGE,
Portland, Oreg., December 30, 1958.

Senator WAYNE L. MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: The Lewis and Clark College Chapter of the American Association of University Professors has unanimously voted to urge the repeal of the "loyalty oath" section 1001 of the National Defense Education Act of 1958. The national A.A.U.P. has long opposed such oaths as both contrary to academic freedom and useless to national defense. The chapter has instructed me to notify you of this vote, and to secure your opinion on this section and to determine what specific steps you will take to remove this oath from the law.

We all recognize the need for a strengthened financial basis for higher education, but we deplore the attaching of such an oath to this otherwise commendable measure.

Sincerely,

DONALD G. BALMER,
President, Lewis and Clark College Chapter, A.A.U.P.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITY PROFESSORS,
Washington, D.C., December 19, 1958.

Hon. WAYNE MORSE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: With this letter you receive a copy of a letter of November 1 by the president and the general secretary of the American Association of University Professors objecting to title X, section 1001(f)(1) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958. Shortly after the letter was sent, it received the unanimous endorsement of the council of the association in session.

You will observe that no objection has been made to section 1001(f)(2) which calls for an affirmative oath of allegiance. Furthermore, although not relevant to our specific objection, I am sure that many association members share my feeling of gratitude and admiration for the work of the Congress in this act and other legislation beneficial to American education.

We would be very grateful for your opinion on the disclaimer affidavit requirement, and we hope that the consensus of legislative opinion will bring about reconsideration in the 86th Congress.

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM P. FIDLER,
General Secretary.

A LETTER SENT TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE COMMITTEE AND THE HOUSE EDUCATION AND LABOR COMMITTEE BY THE OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITY PROFESSORS

NOVEMBER 1, 1958.

DEAR ———: The American Association of University Professors has in mind petitioning the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the 86th Congress to reconsider the requirement of section 1001(f), title X, of the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which reads:

"No * * * funds * * * shall be used to make payments or loans to any individual unless such individual (1) has executed and filed with the Commissioner an affidavit that he does not believe in, and is not a member of and does not support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the United States Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods."

This disclaimer requirement, which will apply to large numbers of young people seeking loans, fellowships and grants to carry on their education, and to many teachers and to consulting experts, seems thoroughly harmful. It singles out persons in education as objects of suspicion; it imposes a "test oath" repugnant to our traditions; and it exposes those signing the affidavit to the possibility of perjury prosecutions resting on vague allegations or improper and intimidating inquiries about their conduct and their beliefs.

The affidavit requirement appears certainly to affect at least these persons:

1. Undergraduate students receiving loans (including minors).
2. Graduate students receiving fellowships.
3. Secondary school guidance and counseling personnel who attend training institutes.
4. Staff of language research centers.
5. Foreign scholars teaching at language research centers.
6. Individuals receiving stipends for advanced training in foreign languages.
7. Staff of language institutes.
8. Individuals attending language institutes who receive stipends.
9. Members of the Advisory Committee on New Educational Media.
10. Special personnel under title VII (TV, radio, cinema).
11. Members of the Science Information Council.

The American Association of University Professors believes that the requirement which it opposes is subject to the following specific objections:

1. Vagueness: A person required to execute a disclaimer statement is given no guidance as to the organizations which are of the designated variety, and no definition of the support to such organizations which he must disclaim. We submit that it is a denial of due process of law to compel an individual to gauge his conduct by such vague criteria, when criminal liability may turn on his action.

2. Unconstitutionality of the substance of the disclaimer: There is ground for grave question concerning the validity of requiring a disclaimer of the sort specified in the act, as a condition of enjoying governmental benefits. The justification which a majority of the U.S. Supreme Court held to be present with relation to the requirement of the Labor-Management Relations Act involved in American Communications Association v. Douds, 339 U.S. 382, is of doubtful applicability here. Moreover, the provision here in question is not in terms limited to knowing support of the specified type of organization; without such a limitation, the provision probably falls under condemnation of the view of the U.S. Supreme Court in Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183.

It is difficult to leave unquestioned legislation which borders so closely on unconstitutionality in a first amendment area, and which may well overstep the line.

3. The invidiousness of the requirement: A disclaimer requirement or test oath by its nature cannot fail to be invidious. If an individual refuses to sign, he raises a suspicion that he is unworthy of public trust or benefit. If he signs, he endorses the pertinency of the general suspicion about him and his kind which is embodied in the requirement. Social safeguards should be directed to specific dangers; they should not, as in this instance, take the form of inescapable and unwarranted derogatory implications directed toward a whole class of persons and all its members.

This association, with a membership of 40,000 college and university teachers, is particularly concerned about the application of the disclaimer to education. In the past, the Federal Government has made available numerous benefits to individuals and organizations whose activities have been of national importance, and who have had a clearly established special need; rarely has there been a requirement of an affidavit or statement disclaiming subversive belief or association. Now, in 1958, we are shocked and alarmed to find that students and teachers, when they are to receive funds, are placed in a special category and must enter a humiliating disclaimer. The act seems to say to members of the educational community: "You are an important part of American life and you have an admitted real need, but let there be no mistake about the fact that you are a particularly suspect part of the population and will have to pass a special test that other citizens need not take." This is a prejudgment of the teachers and students of America which we cannot believe the Congress intended to make.

We respectfully request that you give consideration to the objections stated in this letter. It is our hope that you will conclude that the position of the American Association of University Professors is correct and that you will be able to share it with us.

Sincerely yours,

BENTLEY GLASS,
President.

WILLIAM P. FIDLER,
General Secretary.

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION OF OREGON,
Portland, Oreg., February 6, 1959.

Hon. WAYNE L. MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: On behalf of the executive board of the American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon, I am writing to urge you to use your influence to secure the deletion of section 1001(f), title X, of the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which provides for a disclaimer oath for all the beneficiaries of the act. These include young people seeking loans, fellowships and grants, and many teachers and consulting experts involved in foreign language institutes and in other activities authorized by the act.

The American Civil Liberties Union has for a long time opposed such negative disclaimer oaths on the grounds of their vagueness and the presumption of unreliability which attaches to those individuals and groups selected for this kind of treatment. Since there is no definition of the organizations which are proscribed by the act nor of the term "support," it becomes most difficult for an individual to determine whether he is in a position to subscribe to such an oath. Furthermore, we believe it most undesirable to single out for this invidious treatment some of the ablest and potentially most valuable citizens of our country.

At a time when public opinion is coming increasingly to recognize the importance of higher education, it seems most unfortunate that this kind of an oath should be required. The history of such oaths indicates that they do not achieve their stated objective but may interfere with the attainment of valuable goals such as those which the National Defense Education Act seeks to implement. We trust that you will use your best efforts to secure the removal of this obnoxious provision.

Sincerely yours,

JUDAH BIERMAN,
Chairman.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I am interested in the remarks which the Senator from Oregon has been making with respect to the affidavit provision in the Defense Education Act. I am a member of the Education Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and I should like to say that I am wholly in accord with the view of the Senator from Oregon, so far as the affidavit is concerned. I believe that the Government should not encroach upon freedom of thought and belief in our universities.

Mr. MORSE. I serve on the committee with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. I not only appreciate his contribution to the discussion this afternoon, but I also wish the RECORD to show that of my own knowledge, based upon the position of the Senator from Kentucky, as I know it from working with him on the committee, that was his position last year when the affidavit proposal was made on the floor of the Senate. I shared his view then.

I am hopeful that the bill being offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] will be passed soon, and that we will eliminate the amendment that was added to the bill when it was before the Senate last year. It is discriminatory, and, in the opinion of the university people involved, it carries a nasty implication. It is uncalled for. It ought to be repealed, and repealed quickly at this session of Congress.

The Subcommittee on Education of the Senate Labor Committee is now doing a wonderful job in preparing legislation for Federal financial aid to the States for school construction and teachers' salaries, and I am delighted to extend my full cooperation and assistance in that work. I do hope that as soon as the opportunity arises, however, the subcommittee will turn to this problem of the loyalty affidavit that is a blot upon the fine achievement of the National Defense Education Act.

Most respectfully, let me say that the adoption of that amendment last year is bringing the Congress into disrepute in circles of educators in this country. They cannot understand why we seem to go out of our way to inflict upon the educators of this country an affidavit requirement which we do not impose upon others who are the beneficiaries of Federal legislation.

No educator that I know would be unwilling to take the same oath we take when we become Members of this body; the general oath of allegiance to this form of government of ours; and our swearing under oath our intention to uphold the Constitution of this Government. The correspondence I have inserted makes that clear. But what further oath should we ask? What stronger manifestation of patriotism has the Government a right to ask from any citizen?

I am not at all surprised that this feeling of resentment exists in educational circles in this country because of the affidavit requirement we placed in the bill during the course of the debate in the Senate last year.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ACT OF 1935, AS AMENDED

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act of 1935, as amended.

The bill I propose is the same as the bill which passed the Senate in the 84th Congress. In the 85th Congress, the Senate also passed an Unemployment Compensation Act change which provided for less in the way of benefits than does the proposed legislation. Since the House of Representatives declined to accept the modified version of the bill passed by the Senate in the 85th Congress, I feel, as do the proponents of the proposed legislation, that the Senate should again give consideration to the sounder concepts of unemployment compensation administration contained in the earlier measure.

Mr. President, the major provisions of the bill are:

First, it increases the maximum weekly benefit amount.

Second, it changes the duration period for all eligible claimants to a uniform maximum period of 39 weeks.

Third, it changes the disqualification provisions to a straight 6-week disqualification, with no cancellation of benefits.

The bill makes the maximum weekly benefit amount a specified percentage—67 percent of the average wage of all workers covered by the existing District Unemployment Compensation law, as well as that of Federal employees who are covered by other legislation, computed annually—rather than—a fixed dollar amount.

In order to permit automatic adjustments in the maximum weekly benefit in line with wage trends, the bill provides for annual computation by the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Board of the average weekly wage of workers covered by the law. This computation will be based on reports by employers, including the Federal Government agencies.

It should be noted that the bill does not provide that all claimants shall receive the maximum weekly benefit amount or that any claimant will receive 67 percent of his own average weekly wage. Neither does it change the limitation in the present law, which limits the worker to no more than 50 percent of his weekly wage, or one twenty-third of his wages in a calendar quarter.

The bill provides that all claimants who are eligible for benefits will be able to draw 39 weeks of benefits if they remain unemployed for that long a period. During the period of unemployment, the worker would, of course, be required to be able to work, to be available for work, and to accept suitable work when offered to him. In short, the benefits will be payable for the full period only if the worker's unemployment is due to the lack of suitable job opportunities.

Under the present law, 26 weeks is the maximum for most unemployed, although some get substantially less because of an earnings formula. In addition to lengthening the benefit period of 39 weeks, the bill will eliminate the limiting formula.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1074) to amend the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act of 1935, as amended, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 7(b) of the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act, approved August 28, 1935 (49 Stat. 946), as amended (title 46, ch. 3, D.C. Code, 1951 edition; 68 Stat. 993), is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The weekly benefit amount of any individual qualified therefore under section 7(c) shall be an amount equal to the lesser of the following: (1) One twenty-third of the amount of his earnings for the quarter in his base period in which his earnings were the highest, or (2) 67 per centum of the average weekly earnings of all individuals performing service which constitutes employment (as defined in section 1(b)) and of all individuals performing service which, if such service were not performed in the employ of the United States or of any wholly owned instrumentality thereof, would constitute employment (as defined in section 1(b)) for the latest year for which such average weekly earnings have been computed. Such average weekly earnings shall be computed annually on the basis of reports of earnings and employment by all employers and by the United States, and shall be arrived at by dividing the total earnings paid to all individuals referred to in clause (2) of this subsection during the last completed calendar year for which reports have been received by a quantity equal to four and one-third times the total monthly employment of such individuals for such period. For the purposes of this subsection the term 'earnings' shall have the same meaning as that assigned to such term in section 1(d). All departments, agencies, and wholly owned instrumentalities of the United States shall submit reports to the Board containing such information as may be necessary to make the determination required by this subsection."

(b) Section 7 (c) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(c) To qualify for benefits an individual must have (1) been paid wages for employment of not less than $130 in one quarter in his base period, (2) been paid wages for employment in not less than two quarters in such period, and (3) earned during such period wages the total amount of which is equal to at least one and one-half times the amount of his wages for the quarter in such period in which his wages were the highest. Notwithstanding the provisions of clause (3), any otherwise qualified individual the total amount of whose wages during such period is less than the amount required to have been earned during such period under such clause may qualify for benefits if the difference between the amount so required to have been earned and the total amount of his wages during such period does not exceed $70, but the amount of his weekly benefit, as computed under section 7(b), shall be reduced by $1 if such difference does not exceed $35 or by $2 if such difference is more than $35."

(c) Section 7(d) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(d) Any otherwise eligible individual shall be entitled during any benefit year to a total amount of benefits equal to thirty-nine times his weekly benefit amount: Provided, That such total amount of benefits, if not a multiple of one dollar, shall be computed to the next higher multiple of one dollar."

(d) Subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 10 of such Act are amended to read as follows:

"(a) An individual who has left his most recent work voluntarily without good cause, as determined by the Board under regulations prescribed by it, shall not be eligible for benefits with respect to the week in which such leaving occurred and with respect to the six consecutive weeks of unemployment which immediately follow such week.

"(b) An individual who has been discharged for misconduct occurring in the course of his most recent work proved to the satisfaction of the Board shall not be eligible for benefits with respect to the week in which such discharge occurred and for the six weeks of consecutive unemployment immediately following such week.

"(c) If an individual otherwise eligible for benefits fails, without good cause as determined by the Board under regulations prescribed by it, either to apply for new work found by the Board to be suitable when notified by any employment office, or to accept any suitable work when offered to him by any employment office, his union hiring hall, or any employer direct, he shall not be eligible for benefits with respect to the week in which such failure occurred and with respect to the six consecutive weeks of unemployment which immediately follow such week. In determining whether or not work is suitable within the meaning of this subsection the Board shall consider (1) the physical fitness and prior training, experience, and earnings of the individual, (2) the distance of the place of work from the individual's place of residence, and (3) the risk involved as to health, safety, or morals."

SEC. 2. The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall be effective on and after July 1, 1959, and the benefit rights of any individual having a benefit year current on or after the effective date shall be redetermined and benefits for calendar weeks ending subsequent to the effective date shall be paid in accordance with the provisions of the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act as amended by this Act: Provided, That no claimant shall have his benefits reduced or denied by redetermination resulting from the application of this provision. All initial and continued claims for benefits for weeks occurring within a benefit year which commences on or after the effective date shall be computed and paid in accordance with the provisions of the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act as amended by this Act.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table I have received from the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Board giving a comparison of District unemployed in equivalent weeks in 1957, 1958, and 1959, and other data be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Number of unemployed individuals filing as of the calendar week ending—
Feb. 7, 1959	10,580
Feb. 8, 1958	11,899
Feb. 9, 1957	8,942
Exhaustions by calendar years—
1958	10,692
1957	6,273
1956	5,490
Percentage of individuals filing claims whose benefit year ended in the calendar year who exhausted benefits—
1958	34
1956	29
Percentage of individuals whose benefit year ended during the calendar year and who received 1 or more payments who exhausted their benefits—
1958	42
1957	26
1956	35
Number of individuals exhausting their benefits during the most recent 6 months:

EFFORTS TO MAKE FARMER ECONOMIC SCAPEGOAT RETARD REALISTIC APPROACH TO FARM PROBLEMS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, in the current public debate concerning the President's budget for fiscal year 1960, it frequently appears that a concerted effort has been made to make the American farmer an economic scapegoat. Adverse references by the press, public officials, and nonagricultural groups to the costs and benefits of existing farm programs are often phrased in terms which portray the farmer as a taxpayer's liability—an irritating and unnecessary budgetary burden.

Critical and continuous examination of the justification for Federal programs, as provided in the annual budget process, is an essential procedure in determining the allocation of public funds. But the value of such discussion is reduced in direct proportion to the degree by which analysis disregards facts. Farm programs—and farmers—are presently the victim of much carping criticism based on superficial study.

No person claims that existing farm policy is an unqualified success. For fiscal 1959 the Agricultural Department expenditures will total $6.8 billion. Nearly 70 percent of this sum, or more than $4.8 billion, goes for price-support payments or soil bank bounties to the growers of six basic crops—corn, cotton, wheat, rice, peanuts, and tobacco. In 1957, I was one of only seven Senators voting to abolish the costly and wasteful acreage-reserve phase of the soil bank program.

Government subsidies do not reach three-fourths of American farms, including most of the farms in Oregon. Over 82 percent of price supports are paid to the growers of only 4 commodities, out of some 172 different crops.

One of the real difficulties, in my opinion, is the partisan, political nature of much of the farm discussion. Some Democrats with political ambitions have tried to blame Secretary of Agriculture Benson for technological adjustments on the farm which have been occurring for decades. This is unfair and untrue. In the long run, it will not even prove to be good politics. On the other hand, there are prominent Republicans who pretend unctuously to be shocked over price supports and acreage controls for certain crops, and yet who demand even greater benefactions of this sort for corn—because corn happens to be the dominant crop in key States which generally elect Republicans to the Senate and the House.

This approach to the farm question may serve well a few political goals, but I doubt if it constitutes a service either to agriculture generally or to the Nation.

The Rockefeller Brothers Fund has stated:

> The price-support program does little for the poorest farmers. It is estimated that the 2.7 million farms which sold less than $2,500 of product each averaged only $109 in price supports—far too little to bring those families up to satisfactory living standards. At the same time, 1.3 million farms that sold $5,000 or more of products received an average of $1,993, with many individual support payments running into tens of thousands of dollars.

Inequities and inadequacies of U.S. agricultural policy beg correction. But meaningful revision will be achieved only if the facts of the farm situation are fully known and understood by the public.

Critics of farm programs frequently attack the size of sums appropriated for their implementation on the basis that the amount is too large in relation to the number of persons actually tilling the soil. Such an argument ignores not only the peculiarities of production and marketing inherent in the agricultural sector, which have served to justify Government assistance for over 100 years, but the obvious interrelation and overlap which exist in our complex economy.

Crucial to comprehension of the farm problem is realization of the multiple benefits included in the functional classification "agriculture." Helen Henley, farm editor of the Christian Science Monitor, writing in the January 14, 1959, issue of that newspaper, effectively destroys the statistical strawman erected by some antifarm zealots. She states:

> Before the program can be intelligently revised, the budget needs to be studied. Such study discloses the startling fact that a number of programs are being charged against farmers which, many informed people feel, actually benefit the Nation as a whole more than the farmer. Is it fair, they ask, that programs serving State Department and Defense Department purposes or the public in general be charged entirely to farmers?
> Of the total $6,872 million estimated for the agricultural budget for fiscal 1959, $3,022 million or about 44 percent is going for programs which, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture records, have multiple benefits extending far beyond agriculture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this revealing article by the Christian Science Monitor's capable farm editor appear in its entirety at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FARM EDITOR SAYS

"In the past 50 years, for every $1,000 this country has spent for subsidies the American farmer has received only $5. That's why farmers get awfully tired of metropolitan newspapers headlining the cost of farm subsidies." So spoke Capper's Farmer in an editorial.

With the annual agricultural budget now approaching $7 billion, this statement from a long-respected farm magazine sharply reminds us that the whole farm program—and public opinion about it—may be due for reexamination in depth and drastic revision.

But before the program can be intelligently revised the budget needs to be studied. Such study discloses the startling fact that a number of programs are being charged against farmers which, many informed people feel, actually benefit the Nation as a whole more than the farmer. Is it fair, they ask, that programs serving State Department and Defense Department purposes or the public in general be charged entirely to farmers?

Of the total $6,872 million estimated for the agricultural budget for fiscal 1959, $3,022 million, or about 44 percent, is going for programs which, according to U.S. Department of Agriculture records, have multiple benefits extending far beyond agriculture.

A sum of $1,383 million, for instance, goes for what the USDA classifies as programs relating to foreign aid, including Public Law 480 and the International Wheat Agreement. Under Public Law 480, American surplus agricultural commodities are sold for foreign currencies or given away abroad where there is need.

This program, of course, was developed to help dispose of surplus crops. But the USDA points out concerning the giveaway program, "The main objective here is to strengthen international relations in areas where shaky economic conditions could create a political climate favorable to communism."

Wouldn't it be fair to charge at least part of the cost of this program to the State Department? More and more voices are being raised to ask questions like this.

Among other items inviting review as to classification are $70 million which pays the cost of transferring bartered strategic materials to the national stockpile; $26 million for milk and other dairy products for the armed services and Veterans' Administration, both of which, it seems, might logically be charged to the Defense Department rather than to agriculture.

Some other items involve: $145 million for the school lunch program; $74 million for the school milk program; $21 million for meat inspection; $53 million for disease and pest control—all of which primarily benefit the general public. Why should all these costs be charged against farmers?

Transfer of items from one budget to another would not reduce your taxes by a single dollar, but it would give a more accurate view of the purpose for which your money is being spent and whom, exactly, it benefits.

Although many farmers want the Government to get out of farming and let farmers manage their own business as soon as it can be done without disaster, many others feel that Federal aid of various sorts must continue indefinitely. Several logical answers are ready for the frequently asked question: "Why should we subsidize farmers?"

For one thing, the farmer is perhaps the one man in the economy whom the Nation cannot do without. The food and fiber he produces are essential for us all. If the continuing cost-price squeeze threatens to put him out of business, then for the general welfare, aid must be provided to keep him producing.

And, say many farmers, why should subsidies for agriculture be any more under fire than the subsidies paid to many other groups?

These include, according to Government figures, such annual amounts as: $670 million to the Post Office; $137 million for aid to navigation; $50 million for ship operations; $93 million for aid to air navigation.

Then there is some $200 million in the form of grants to States for operating employment service and unemployment compensation programs which, some feel, might be considered a subsidy to labor. The question has also been raised as to whether tax writeoffs accorded certain industries might not also be labeled as subsidies.

Farmers are paying tax money to support all these programs, it has been pointed out—why should not they in turn receive help when they need it?

All this does not change the fact that the farm program, even if pared down to the items legitimately chargeable to agriculture, is costing tremendous sums—nor does it lessen one iota the responsibility of citizens to demand that the new Congress devise more realistic, and possibly less expensive, plans.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, proper assignment of costs to those benefited permits a more realistic picture of the farm problem. But this accounting procedure does not reveal that—

In the past 18 years, farmers have increased productivity as much as in preceding 120 years; if farm efficiency today were what it was back in 1940, consumers' food bill would be $13 billion higher.

Production and distribution of farm products, together with servicing of farmers, constitutes the Nation's largest single industry, employing 37 percent of the Nation's working force.

While making up 12 percent of the population and producing 65 percent of the raw materials for industry, farmers in 1957 got only 4 percent of the national income.

One-third of net farm income in 1957 came from off-farm jobs.

From 1952 through 1957 farm prices declined 20 percent.

In the past 50 years, for every $1,000 this country has spent for subsidies, the American farmer has received only $5.

These facts taken from an article, "What City People Should Know About Farmers" in the December 1958 issue of Capper's Farmer, illustrate the nature of the farmer's plight. I ask unanimous consent that this cogent presentation be incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT CITY PEOPLE SHOULD KNOW ABOUT FARMERS

What's the world coming to? The Government is paying farmers billions so they won't grow stuff, and we get stuck with high food prices. Wish they'd pay me for not working."

You don't need oversized ears to hear remarks like this in almost any grocery store. It's easy for city consumers to get worked up over grocery bills and the expense of farm programs. No matter how you slice it, food bills are high in dollars and cents, and we've been spending lots of tax dollars to control crop surpluses—and we still have surpluses.

It's easy, too, to single out the farmer as the scoundrel. He's far removed from the supermarket scene and has no well integrated organization behind him to tell his story. There's no real spokesman for farmers; no one to filter the facts from a fog of headlines and oratory.

Is the farmer a highwayman, riding high, with one hand in your pocket and the other in Uncle Sam's? Is he so rich that we should stop using tax dollars in his behalf?

What is the real story? Let's look at the facts.

We're just as dependent on the land for food and clothing as when we shot the buffalo and deer. But in 1820 one man could provide food for himself and three other people. Today one farmer feeds himself and 20 others. Soon it will be himself and 25 others.

Here is the core of the farm problem: In any normal peacetime year farmers can produce more than the market will take at prices fair to everyone concerned.

The reason is that we have, through research, education, and the application of mechanical power to agriculture, created a whole new way of producing farm products. The revolution is still going on. In the past 18 years farmers have boosted their efficiency as much as in the preceding 120 years.

Farmers have much more help from city workers than they did 100 years ago—tractors, chemicals, fertilizers, fuels, an abundance of many other services. Farmers are free to specialize in producing food. And, since the early 1940's, the combined per-acre yield of 18 leading field crops has increased dramatically—40 percent. But producing food is only part of it.

The food business is a chain with farmers at one end. In between farms and shelves of supermarkets is the marketing system.

The off-farm operations are handled by some 6 million persons who are producing for and serving farmers and around 10 million who are distributing farm products. Adding these to around 8 million farm operators and farmhands makes about 24 million persons.

We call this combination of functions by a new term—agribusiness. It's the Nation's largest business, accounting for 37 percent of the U.S. working force. In their part of it, farmers are a $14-billion-a-year customer of industry and labor—not counting the billions farm people spend for consumer goods.

Are farmers to blame for high food prices? You be the judge. Last year, some 60 cents out of every dollar we Americans spent for food went to the people who bought, handled, sold, processed, transported, and packaged farm products.

A little less than 40 cents went to farmers.

Or let's put it another way: If a farmer in Kansas gave away his wheat, we'd still pay 17½ cents for that 20-cent loaf of bread. If a cotton producer in Texas worked only for his health, we'd still shell out $2.75 for that $3 shirt.

Percentagewise and dollarwise, food marketing costs are at the highest level since 1940. In 1957, we spent $55 billion for farm food products, against only $15 billion in 1940. Of this increase, $27 billion went for marketing.

But before we start pointing the finger in a new direction, let's remember a couple of things. A lot happens to food on its journey from farm to supermarket. Consumers are demanding more all the time. We want "convenience foods," for example, with built-in maid service, heat-and-serve rolls, smaller units, better packaging, prebaking, precutting, and preselection. We didn't have these services in 1940—and they aren't free.

Take a look at the chart on the right. It shows how the cost of all farm products bought by the average family has changed in recent years.

In 1946, the typical market basket of food cost $767. Of that the farmer got $397. By 1957 that same basket cost $1,010, but the farmer was getting only $400.

To bring that closer to home, that means that from 1946 to 1957 the farmer's share went up $3; the marketing share, $240.

Here's how the increase in spread was largely accounted for: labor, $296, up $130; transportation, $73, up $33; other business costs $178, up $69; and Federal income taxes added $4.

Before you come to a verdict, let's look at still more facts: From 1952 through 1957, with ever-increasing inflation, farm prices actually decreased 20 percent. Here are the figures: Total farm income in 1952 is estimated at $15.1 billion. By 1956 it had dropped to $12.1 billion. Last year it skidded to a low of $10.8 billion.

This is the reason why food prices remained fairly stable in this 1952–57 period. Think what would have happened had farm prices gone up at the same rate as other cost-of-living items. We would have paid some 25 percent more for food and clothing.

Net result would have been a really whopping burden for consumers—some $70 billion, at least, say economists.

So * * * it's only fair to point out that in the 1952–57 period farmers actually subsidized consumers.

While nearly all other phases of our national economy have been moving upward in recent years, agriculture simply hasn't kept pace.

Although they make up 12 percent of the population and produce 65 percent of the raw materials for industry, farmers in 1957 got only 4 percent of the national income.

And during this time, the cost of practically all the farmer's tools of production has increased. His costs in 1957 were some $3.7 billion higher than in 1952. This is what farmers are talking about when they mention "cost-price squeeze."

The squeeze has put a lot of farmers out of business. In 1950, for example, 25,058,000 people lived on farms. That's 16.6 percent of all of us. Now, 8 years later, though population has increased, there are some 5 million fewer farmers—and they represent only 12 percent of the population of the United States.

And remember, too, many of those who remain have to work off the farm to make ends meet. In 1957, for example, one-third of the net farm income came from off-the-farm jobs.

SUBSIDIES

Now, what about farm subsidies? Sure, the Federal Government helps farmers. But so does it help airlines, schools, the petroleum industry, housing, shipping, and so on. A fast tax writeoff plan saves power companies billions of dollars. Just try to name a business that is not receiving some type of government aid.

In the past 50 years, for every $1,000 this country has spent for subsidies, the American farmer has received only $5. That's why farmers get awfully tired of metropolitan newspapers headlining the cost of farm subsidies.

Because food and fiber have been at bargain prices compared with other cost-of-living items, it's discouraging to farmers to defend half-truths about the $5 billion the Federal Government takes from the taxpayers to run the national agricultural budget. Also, to continually hear the charge: "You're taking money out of my pocket to support farm prices."

What makes up the agricultural budget? How much of it goes to farmers? The farm budget is something of a catchall. Many of the items have nothing to do with supporting farm prices, but are primarily a public service. Take meat inspection, for example. It has been a $17 million item conducted by the U.S. Department of Agriculture to assure the public a safe meat supply.

Other public services include a Government school lunch program and a food donation plan. In fiscal 1958 the Government gave 872 million pounds of food from surplus food stocks for school lunch programs and institutions. It gave 1,400,000 pounds to victims of national disasters. And 1,973,000 pounds were donated for distribution to the needy abroad.

We could name more items similar to these. Even the USDA's crop and livestock estimates are issued more by processors and merchants than by farmers.

Moreover, look at all the agricultural exports to friendly nations since World War II. A big portion of these would have been purchased at U.S. Government expense even if there had been no surplus disposal problem. Using our food abundance has given our foreign policy "leverage." Farmers feel the costs of this should not be charged to agriculture alone.

Sooner or later, of course, the Government must collect from taxpayers every dollar that it spends. If the Government loses money on price supports—and it certainly has—then it must be made up in taxes. No one's satisfied in a situation like this—neither the rural taxpayer nor the city taxpayer.

What should be done to spread out the national income? Even farmers don't agree on just what the Government should do about getting them a fairer share of the national income. Most of them realize the thing that's responsible for depressing their prices—surpluses.

But how do you get rid of surpluses? That's been the big problem. No matter how much wealth we now have we can eat only so much—stomachs are pretty inelastic.

We have an excellent disposal record for moving our surplus stocks out of inventory and into some useful consumption at home or abroad. Our export market is important. It accounted for 12 cents of every dollar the farmer got in 1957. But this is a market that must be cultivated intensely. We can't get rid of all our overproduction in foreign lands without acquiring more problems.

Actually, farmers would need to cut production only about 8 percent to get rid of troublesome surpluses.

Then why don't farmers just produce less? That would be fairly easy to do if the big business that is farming were big agriculture. But it isn't. It is some 4½ million farmers scattered over a Nation which has swelled to 173 million.

Organizationwise, agriculture stands about where industry and labor stood some 50 to 75 years ago. The farmer is an individual in a great sea of competition. He is a price taker, not a price setter.

A farmer works with an uncontrollable business partner—nature. Sun, wind, and rains control his cash register like a fickle bookkeeper.

No single farmer can do much about changing the supply of food, fiber, and tobacco coming to market. And collectively, farmers can't produce just exactly what our Nation demands. Agriculture is a biological process which cannot be greatly accelerated or retarded in any short time.

Too, 90 percent of our production is accomplished by 2.1 million farmers. Some 2.4 million farmers struggle for the remaining 10 percent. Working out satisfactory answers in a farm program for both groups is no easy chore.

What farm programs have been tried so far? Congress has taken two broad approaches. It has built floors under prices to assure the farmer minimum guarantees for his basic crops. These crops are corn, wheat, cotton, tobacco, rice, and peanuts. And it has tried to cut down acreages of these crops on the assumption that if less is planted, surpluses will melt away and prices will go up on their own.

The soil bank is an example of the second approach. In 1957 some 5,235,000 acres of land were taken out by corn farmers, 12,785,000 by wheat farmers, and 3,015,000 acres by cotton farmers as part of the program. This part of the soil bank—called the acreage reserve—has been dropped. But the conservation reserve portion is still in effect. Farmers are asked to put some portion of their land into grass or trees and an annual rental is paid the farmer for each year of the contract—up to 10 years.

Our major farm policy revolves around the six basic crops which make up only 24 percent of the value of all our crops. Congress sets the rules, and the Government through the Secretary of Agriculture and its agencies such as the Commodity Credit Corporation, buys or takes over commodities as required to provide price support. Such commodities are stored, sold, disposed of.

But don't price supports cost a lot of money? Not as much as you might think. For the 4 fiscal years ending July 1957, the total cost of all programs—primarily to stabilize farm prices and income, including Commodity Credit Corp. losses—was about $7½ billion.

But only part of this went to farmers. Part of it went to business for storage of products and other costs.

To make this kind of price support less costly to the Government, there have been marketing quotas and acreage allotments. In this way farmers pay for the help they get from the Government; they submit to regulations that divide up the right to produce.

As a result, farmers are much more efficient now than 10 years ago. Progress in know-how makes food cheaper.

If farmers farmed today as they did in 1940, the consumers' food bill would be at least $13 billion a year higher than it currently is. So this question is raised: Which is better, to have a surplus costing the consumer $3 to $4 billion a year in taxes, or to save him $13 billion a year on food?

What does the farmer want? At the moment some farm leaders are pressing hard for lower price supports, greater flexibility, and more freedom in agriculture. A good many farmers think this goal is desirable. They want to outgrow Federal programs by gradually strengthening the farm economy.

At the same time, farmers realize we live in an era characterized by the minimum wage and generally stabilized industrial prices. Farmers want to protect themselves against the increasing costs of production and distribution. They want to mobilize their strength to bargain on a more equal basis with highly organized industry and labor.

Considering the independent character of the farmer, he has in general cooperated well with Government programs. He has withstood the hard knocks of low prices, a rising cost of living and higher prices for what he must buy, and reduction of acres.

He has tried hard to compensate for reduced acres—and succeeded. It is the basic philosophy of a farmer to produce. Traditionally he feels it is a contradiction of nature to say he cannot use technology to best advantage.

Just how much does a farmer have invested? Farm investment per worker in the Corn Belt is about $50,000. That compares with about $15,000 per worker in industry. Farmers have $3 invested in production for every $1 that is invested in marketing of their products.

When prices are falling, the only way the heavily capitalized commercial farmer can stay in business is to cut his costs and produce more volume. So farmers have by greater capital and more know-how produced more on less acres.

In 1957, there were about 319 million acres of 59 crops harvested in the United States. Our harvest almost equaled the largest in history—and on the smallest acreage. The 1958 harvest may equal the highest ever recorded in this country despite a record low in acres.

As total supplies of grain have been built up during the years, increasing percentages of carryover stocks have been coming under Government control. This is inevitable under the system of price supports we have used, with Government storage frequently substituting for actual marketing.

Have any steps been taken to correct this? The 1958 Congress made several changes in our farm laws. More changes are being proposed. These may move us away from Government domination of the agriculture industry. And they may allow market prices more influence in guiding production and consumption.

Farmers' net income climbed to an annual rate of $13.3 billion in the first half of 1958. The total for all of 1958 may show some improvement over 1957.

This gain was partially due to winter freezes in 1957–58 which cut citrus and vegetable crops in the South. Too, cattle prices climbed a bit because ranchers held back cattle to restock ranges blasted by 4 or 5 drought years.

Despite seasonal price fluctuations that may seem temporarily to favor the farmer, the farm problem remains. It belongs to all of us. It is as near to all of us as our next meal. We gain 8,000 new mouths to feed every day. By 1975 we may well have 230 million people in this country. We'll have fewer farmers to feed us, but we can count on a healthy agriculture to respond to this challenge.

WHAT ABOUT THE FUTURE?

What's in the future? We can't hope to eat our way out of our surpluses, but while we are working our way out of them, let's understand just what our situation really is.

Consumers should continue to benefit from agricultural research and marketing research which is now being emphasized as it never has been before.

Chances are good that the actual proportion of your disposable income spent for food will continue to remain fairly constant—about 25 percent.

You may feel food prices are higher than formerly. But stop and think if you are eating meat 10 times a week instead of 7. Or if you are eating chicken instead of beans, or eggs instead of oatmeal.

Remember—everything is high in terms of dollars compared with prewar prices. But this isn't due to inefficiency in production and marketing of food. It is evidence of inflation or of a depreciation in the value of our money.

Realize that it took the average factory employee 30 minutes to earn enough to buy 1 pound of choice steak in 1947. In 1957 it took him 18 minutes.

Think, too, of all the conveniences that come with food, all of which put direct pressure on the budget. And consider your supermarket may have 7,000 items on the shelves. Nonfood items go into the grocery sack, too.

The important thing is to make wise decisions, now and in the future. Many farmers feel that, before we drop everything in our farm program for something new, we should demonstrate that there is a road back if new plans fail.

The farm population is shrinking; it will be only a little more than 5 percent of our population by 1975. So, if wise decisions are to be made in the field of farm policy, nonfarm people must be well informed.

This, we believe, is the real story. This is what city people should know about farmers.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the Conference on Economic Progress recently published a detailed and comprehensive study of the results of the current farm program. This review, directed by the respected economist Leon Keyserling, and entitled, "Toward a New Farm Policy," represents a detailed and penetrating analysis of the farm problem.

The CEP report points out that—

Since 1947, the farmer's income from all sources has been pushed downward 23 percent in real terms, while incomes of the nonfarm population have moved upward 48 percent in real terms. After a brief upward flurry in 1958, farm incomes and prices are again moving downward. Our farm families now have only about 50 percent of income parity with other groups.

Findings of the study indicate that farm families—are being driven off the land without opportunity for full employment at good incomes elsewhere. The "factory in the field" is supplanting the family-type farm. And this change, instead of lifting farm living standards, is accentuating the impoverishment of farm families. The land care and machinery needed to conserve and prepare agriculture for the growing needs of a growing population are being neglected. To achieve good diets for all American families, and add fairly to the food and fiber supply of the free world, would require nearly one-fourth more U.S. farm production by 1964 than in 1957.

Report statistics reveal farm price-support program losses "totaled less than $6 billion for the 25-year period from October 1933 through September 1958, or about $235 million annually. From July 1953 through June 1958 they averaged annually about $913 million, or almost 5½ times as much as during the previous 7-year period." But despite the increased rate, farm surpluses during this period were small when compared with our other economic surpluses such as idle steel capacity and unemployment.

Mr. President, the CEP review of the farm situation represents an excellent survey of the effect of agricultural depression on our economy, and I ask unanimous consent that selected excerpts of the report be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DEPRESSION OF FARM INCOME

Farmers are the human element in the farm problem. Therefore, depressed farm income is the most serious moral aspect of this problem. It is also the more serious economic aspect. Depressed farm income hurts farmers more, injures workers and consumers more, and costs the country more, than farm surpluses or other aspects of the farm problem.*

Comparing 1958 with 1947, net farm operators' income has gone down 32 percent in real terms. Even including the farmer's income from nonfarm work and nonfarm investments, total farm income from all sources has gone down 23 percent in real terms. During the same time, the income of the nonfarm population has gone up 48 percent in real terms.

From 1953 through 1958, net farm operators' income has declined almost 2 percent a year on the average, while nonfarm income has risen more than 2 percent a year. The average rise in dividend income has been almost 4 percent a year, and in interest income almost 6 percent.

The apologists say that shrinking farm income is being divided among fewer farm families. This ignores the hurt to farm families driven from poverty on the farm to poverty off the farm. Counting those still on the farm, per capita farm income from farm sources, adjusted for price change, declined from a peak of $872 in 1948 to only $701 in 1958. Per capita farm income from all sources was $1,096 in 1948. By 1958, it was only $999, compared with per capita nonfarm income of $1,985. While these comparisons are subject to statistical imperfections, and while brief treatment prevents more refined analysis, the disparities of farm incomes and living standards are clear. * * *

Allowing for the size of the farm population relative to the nonfarm population, poor families with incomes of less than $1,000 a year are about 8 times as heavily concentrated in the farm sector as elsewhere. Poor families below $2,000 are about 6 times as heavily concentrated in the farm sector. Many farm families are deprived of such elementary needs as running water and other sanitary facilities. They also suffer from a low level of public services—especially education and health.

The rise in farm income during 1958 was very small, compared with the long beating farm income had taken, and most of this rise was due to exceptional weather and other unusual and temporary factors. And by late 1958, farm income and the parity ratio were again moving downward. The Department of Agriculture now estimates 1959 farm income 5–10 percent lower than in 1958—while other incomes are again rising.

THE FARM DEPRESSION HURTS OTHER WORKERS AND CONSUMERS

To count the hurtful effects of the farm depression upon others, we must look at our whole economy. During the 6-year period 1953–58, our total economic expansion (averaging only 1.3 percent a year) has been considerably less than a third of the amount needed for full production and full employment. In consequence, our total national production has been more than $150 billion below full production. Man-years of employment opportunity have been about 10 million too low. The average American family, for this 6-year period as a whole, has had about $2,800 less income than it would have had with full prosperity for all.

How have these trends, so damaging to our whole economy, been influenced by the farm depression? All of our economic trouble has come largely from a deficiency in private consumption, which during the 6-year period as a whole has been equal to about 63 percent of the total production deficiency. The farm population, during this period, has averaged only about 12½ percent of our total population. But the deficiency in consumer spending by farm operators' families alone has amounted to about 17 percent of the total deficiency in private consumption.

Farmers are also big spenders for capital goods, even when their incomes are depressed. And it is clear that capital expenditures by farmers would have been much higher, if agriculture had enjoyed prosperity. During the 6-year period 1953–58, the deficiency in capital spending by farmers came to almost 28 percent of the deficiency in total private capital spending.

During this period, the deficiency in farm operators' net income has been about 23 percent of the total income deficiency of all American consumers.

In 1958, total true unemployment in the United States was about 3.4 million higher than in 1953. Comparing the same 2 years, farm employment (as measured by the Department of Agriculture) declined by more than 1.3 million. The decline in farm employment thus was a substantial factor in the increase in unemployment throughout the Nation.

Putting all of these facts together, it may be estimated that somewhere between one-fourth and one-third of our gigantic deficiencies in total production and employment opportunity, during the past 6 years, have been due to the farm depression.

ADMINISTERED PRICES, INDUSTRIAL WAGES, AND THE FARMER

The farm depression is due largely to falling farm prices. But it is also due to rising industrial prices—the "administered" prices of the things the farmer buys. In addition, rising consumer prices for food and clothing decrease the real consumption of farm products; they also prejudice the consumer against the farmer. And rising prices for other consumer items cut into the amount which the consumer can spend for food and clothing.

A sound approach to the farm problem requires that we know the causes of this price inflation. Especially, we must understand whether there is a connection between wage trends and price inflation. For the opinion is widespread—though not correct—that rising wages have been responsible for the price inflation so damaging to farmers and others.

In the period leading up to the recent economic recession, administered industrial prices rose rapidly. And the profits earned by great industries which lifted their prices were enormous; their profits rose far more than their prices. Accordingly, this is very clear: Even with the wage increases which actually occurred these prices could have been held steady—or raised very little—and still yielded fair profits. Looking at administered consumer prices, the situation was much the same.

During this same period leading up to the economic recession, the profits of leading corporations rose very much faster than wage rates. Correspondingly, investment in the means of production outran consumption. The most serious economic recession since World War II resulted. And even after a sharp recession in their own sales commenced, these big industries, instead of reducing prices to expand sales, raised prices still faster. Administered consumer prices also rose rapidly during the recession.

The agitation against wage earners, undertaken by the same forces who have been deflating farm income, seems to be part of an effort to divide farmers and workers. This hurts both groups. It benefits only those between the farmer and the consumer, who buy farm products too cheaply, and who hire labor for less than they should pay.

Of course, those who work for wages in agriculture are paid far less than industrial workers. But the remedy is not to reduce industrial wages; it is to lift farm wages. The very low level of farm wages has a depressive effect upon agricultural life. And if farm wages today are "high" relative to the farmer's ability to pay, the remedy is to restore farm income.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, there is no easy legislative solution to the economic troubles which face many of today's farmers. But efforts to correct the current situation are not aided by misstatement of the facts. I hope that the statements and statistics cited above will assist in placing the farm problem in proper perspective.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] has some other matter he wishes to bring before the Senate, I am ready to move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow. I so move.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 17, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 16, 1959:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The following-named Foreign Service officers for promotion from class 1 to the class of career minister:

Lampton Berry, of Mississippi.
Foy D. Kohler, of Ohio.
Philip D. Sprouse, of Tennessee.
Clifton R. Wharton, of California.

The following-named persons, now Foreign Service officers of class 2 and secretaries in the diplomatic service, to be also consuls general of the United States of America:

John D. Tomlinson, of Illinois.
J. Raymond Ylitalo, of Minnesota.

The following-named Foreign Service officers for promotion from class 2 to class 1:

Loren Carroll, of Illinois.
John B. Holt, of Maine.
C. Montagu Pigott, of California.
George F. Wilson, of California.
Thomas K. Wright, of Florida.

The following-named Foreign Service officers for promotion from class 2 to class 1 and to be also consuls general of the United States of America:

Orville C. Anderson, of California.
Willis C. Armstrong, of Maine.
N. Spencer Barnes, of California.
Robert G. Barnes, of Pennsylvania.
Ben H. Brown, Jr., of South Carolina.
Norman Burns, of Ohio.
Sterling J. Cottrell, of Rhode Island.
Thomas S. Estes, of Maine.
Mose L. Harvey, of Maryland.
Sidney B. Jacques, of New York.

Hare, of West Virginia, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the United Arab Republic, to serve concurrently and without additional compensation as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Kingdom of Yemen.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Father John Kidykas., S.J., Lithuanian Jesuit Fathers' House, Chicago, Ill., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, Father of infinite love, Father of all wisdom and orderliness, Father of all life and happiness, I humbly pray Thee to bless this House of Representatives, charged by Thee and by the people with the promotion of order, peace, and happiness. May this blessing of Thine include a large share of Thy divine wisdom, of Thy merciful justice, and of Thy just love, which alone can enable them to cooperate with Thee in promoting Thy kingdom of truth and life, Thy kingdom of sanctity and grace, Thy kingdom of justice, love, and peace, and so to insure our Nation's true and lasting welfare.

And since Thou didst command us to love also our neighbor, so, Father of all oppressed and suffering, I entreat Thee to move the hearts and wills of each one here present to search and to find ways and means for bringing freedom and liberty to nations and peoples oppressed by a ruthless enemy of all that is holy, truly human and just, and which is constantly threatening the remaining free nations with subversion and subjugation.

In behalf of those doomed, as it seems, to perish in that godless slavery, today I recommend to Thy mercy in a special way, and to the sympathetic help of this noble body the people of Lithuania. Grant O Lord, that this Congress may never abandon that small nation to extinction by Thine own bitter enemies, but rather that it may prove to be the good Samaritan, protecting the natural rights to life, liberty, and happiness, even of the weakest of nations, so that, restored to its freedom, the Lithuanian people may again join the family of free nations as grateful witness of Thy merciful help and powerful victory over the forces of evil, and to rejoice in Thy glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 12, 1959, was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT TO JOINT COMMITTEE ON DEFENSE PRODUCTION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

FEBRUARY 13, 1959.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to section 712(a)(2) of the Defense Production Act of 1950 I have appointed the following members of the Banking and Currency Committee to be members of the Joint Committee on Defense Production: Hon. PAUL BROWN, Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, Hon. ALBERT RAINS, Hon. GORDON L. MCDONOUGH, Hon. EDGAR W. HIESTAND.

With kind regards, I am,
Very sincerely,

BRENT SPENCE.

GROUND BREAKING FOR EXTENSION OF THE EAST FRONT OF THE CAPITOL

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce to the Members, so that they will be on notice, that the ground breaking for the extension of the east front of the Capitol will take place on Monday, February 23, at 11 o'clock a.m.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following resignation from a committee:

JANUARY 21, 1959.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Having become the ranking majority member of the Committee on Armed Services I find that I do not have adequate time to devote to that position and continue to serve on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Therefore, I hereby resign as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Thank you for the opportunity to serve on that most important committee.

Sincerely,

PAUL J. KILDAY,
Member of Congress.

Without objection the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT TO COMMITTEE ON ATOMIC ENERGY

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of title 42, United States Code, section 2251, the Chair appoints as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS] to fill the existing vacancy thereon.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may sit during whatever general debate may be carried on in the House this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, February 23, 1959, Washington's Farewell Address may be read by a Member to be designated by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

LITHUANIA

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, while commemorating the 41st anniversary of the restoration of independence to the Republic of Lithuania after World War I, it appears fitting to keep in mind the circumstances in which Lithuania lost its independence and became one of the colonies of the Soviet empire.

It seems also particularly fitting to review briefly Soviet Russia's action in the case of Lithuania at the time when pressure is developing for negotiating with Soviet Russia new agreements and new treaties regrading Germany.

The story of the annexation of Lithuania by the Soviet Union is a story of broken treaties, broken agreements, and brazen disregard for international rules of conduct.

I wonder how much value and how much significance could our leaders attach to whatever agreements or arrangements Soviet Russia subscribes to, in view of that country's conduct with regard to Lithuania and her two similarly small sister Republics, Estonia and Latvia.

Soviet Russia solemnly agreed in 1920 to respect the independence of the three Baltic Republics in duly signed peace treaties. Soviet Russia signed those treaties with each of the three countries located on its northwestern borders recognizing the three new sovereignties and subsequently entering voluntarily with each of them into contractual agreements under which diplomatic, consular, and trade relationship were duly established.

In 1928, at the initiative of Soviet Russia, there was signed in Moscow a special agreement, the so-called Litvinov protocol, providing for the immediate entry into force of the so-called Kellogg Pact, signed in Paris on August 27, 1928. Soviet Russia and all of her neighbors agreed to renounce war as an instrument of national policy and proceeded—again at Mr. Litvinov's initiative—to negotiate an elaborate series of nonaggression treaties again providing for the inviolability of all borders separating Soviet Russia from its neighbors. Those treaties were signed by Soviet Russia in 1932.

The carefully prepared and solemnly established structure of collective security agreements, duly signed and ratified, did not for one moment stop Soviet Russia from requesting, in 1940, the stationing of Soviet troops in Lithuania, in Latvia and in Estonia. Objections and protests of the three small Baltic countries were met with a show of force and with a direct threat to use it. The three independent countries had to surrender and Soviet troops erased the inviolate borders. In July 1940, Soviet occupation of the three countries and the annexation was completed.

I am proud to say that this at least is one of the numerous Soviet annexations of foreign territory which the United States has not recognized, and that we still have here in Washington the three diplomatic missions representing free Lithuania, free Estonia and free Latvia.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the memory of the flagrant disregard for international contractual agreements shown by Soviet Russia in the case of the three Baltic Republics, will remain in the minds of our diplomats who intended to sit down with their Soviet colleagues to negotiate more treaties and more agreements which as far as Soviet Russia is concerned will—I am sure—be again relegated to the Kremlin's wastebasket whenever it suits the purposes of the Kremlin's masters to do so.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to join my colleagues in solemn observance of Lithuania's independence day, the 41st anniversary of the day when her people rose from the destruction of the First World War to proclaim an independent republic.

Those who are students of the proud history of Lithuania remind us that since the 13th century she has a record of identity as a sovereign state, that her people have resisted all efforts to force them into a cultural and political mold that is foreign to them.

Invaded, fought over, conquered by brute force and larger numbers on many occasions, they nevertheless have always kept alive the memory of freedom.

They seized their chance for independence again when the czar's armies disintegrated, and on February 16, 1918, they proclaimed their Republic. It was not their good fortune to be given many years of freedom. They became a pawn in 1939 of the grim struggle between the Nazi and Soviet empires; they were fought over in the savage years that followed; they have not yet been able to reestablish their independent government. But in little more than a decade, they had established their right to freedom.

The first land-reform law of modern Europe was a Lithuanian law. An education program was launched which reduced illiteracy to 15 percent after generations of foreign rule had left two-thirds of the people unable to read and write.

It is not possible for the Lithuanians on their farms and in their cities to celebrate this anniversary day, for the Soviet system has got them by the throat. But it is with good cause that our State Department has refused, all through these years, to recognize as legal and right the Kremlin's claim that Lithuania has been swallowed up and extinguished, incorporated in the vast Communist empire.

Nations do not die merely because some other nation decimates or drives out their leaders and puts quislings and puppets in their stead.

The love of freedom is powerful and enduring, the spark of liberty is not easily put out. Wherever the children of the Lithuanian people dwell today, they have the right to work in all proper ways toward the end of independence for the land of their fathers. It is proper for us to recognize the day of commemoration they celebrate.

BUILDING OF STEAM TURBINE GENERATORS BY FOREIGN CORPORATIONS

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1959, I wrote a letter to the Director of the Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization regarding the national security problems of heavy electrical equipment imports and placed a copy of my letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Now there is a new problem of grave concern to the country and to the people of the congressional district I represent.

A pennywise but pound-foolish action by our Government has in one move weakened the defense potential of this Nation and jeopardized the jobs of at least 700 skilled American workmen.

I refer to the recent decision of the Tennessee Valley Authority to purchase a giant steam turbine generator for installation on the TVA system. This generator—the biggest yet built for use in the United States—will be manufactured, not by an American company but by an English manufacturer, the C. A. Parsons Co. Thus, the largest single unit in the vital TVA power system will be dependent for repair and maintenance on a factory across the Atlantic Ocean, which in time of war could be completely cut off and unable to do the job.

And why have we been forced to turn to a foreign company for such a key unit in our Nation's power system? The answer is, of course, that we were not forced at all. We chose to do so because we could get a cutrate price—a price made possible by the low wages paid in England. English wages, on the average, are only about one-third—recent comparisons indicate 37 percent—as high as American average wage rates. The American manufacturers, of course, observe minimum-wage laws and other legislation which benefit the American workman, but foreign bidders are exempted from such regulations.

So how does Uncle Sam handle this situation? He blithely pits the American companies against the foreign companies in a ruthless price competition and gives the order to a foreign firm. Meanwhile in cities like Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Schenectady, and Milwaukee, skilled American workmen are laid off in sizable numbers in the heavy electrical apparatus plants of Westinghouse, General Electric, and Allis-Chalmers. In these labor depressed areas, men with as much as 17 years' service and seniority will be affected by this latest TVA foreign purchase.

The low U.S. bidder in this instance, after TVA evaluated the base bids, was the Westinghouse Electric Corp. which manufactures generators in East Pittsburgh and steam turbines in Lester, which is near Philadelphia.

I note that my friend from New York, Mr. Stratton, stated yesterday that the General Electric Co. was the low American bidder on this turbogenerator. According to the TVA office in Washington, Westinghouse Electric Corp. was the American company whose bid was the lowest when evaluated in terms of the TVA specifications. This means that Westinghouse would have been awarded this TVA contract if it had not been awarded to the British company.

The loss of this big order for the half-million kilowatt TVA steam turbine generator means 1,080,000 man-hours of work lost to Westinghouse workmen. It means another 375,000 man-hours of work lost to the employees of Westinghouse suppliers. Altogether it means the loss of 1 year's work for 700 workmen. All because our Government pretends that American companies like Westinghouse, General Electric, Allis-Chalmers, and others ought to be able to compete on a nearly equal basis pricewise with foreign companies who pay their workers only about one-third as much.

American companies obviously cannot compete against low foreign prices on heavy, custom-built electric power equipment which contains such high labor content. Steam turbine generators are very big and complex machines, each one somewhat different from the next. A great deal of manual labor is involved in their construction. There is no assembly line possible in this business to help reduce the foreign wage differential. Unless our Government considers more than the selling price, American companies will never get another order for power generators from our own Government.

Even if our Government chooses to disregard the security and welfare of its laboring citizens, the national security cannot be disregarded. For some time, the Government has been buying more and more electrical equipment abroad to take advantage of the cheap prices. But now, for the first time, the United States has bought a steam turbine generator abroad. The steam turbine generator is the prime mover in any electric power system. It is the source of the electricity—the heart of our modern production system. Our biggest steam turbine generator is being procured abroad. What does this mean in terms of our national security? It means we are putting our biggest eggs in a very weak basket.

Power generators are not quickly repairable or replaceable. Their maintenance requires ready access to the plants of the manufacturer and the technical help of his engineers. The Parsons company has three technical men in all of North America and depends on parts and other replacement items from England—which could be cut off from ocean transportation in time of war. On the other hand, a firm like Westinghouse has more than 1,000 field service engineers on its technical staff and its manufacturing plants are close by. Which company would you like to depend on to keep your power system running in a national emergency?

Furthermore, Westinghouse and the other American manufacturers of heavy electrical equipment have been the leaders in research and development of this power apparatus. Parsons is facing the job of designing and building a 500,000-kilowatt turbine generator and the biggest unit they ever built before is 120,000 kilowatts. Westinghouse, on the other hand, is now building a 325,000-kilowatt unit and has experience in the temperatures and pressures which the new TVA unit will require.

What do you suppose the British would do in the same situation? We do not have to guess—we know. They would refuse to buy from a foreign company. The Central Electricity Authority of Great Britain is the agency that buys practically all of Britain's heavy electric power apparatus. And that agency does not buy power generators from foreign firms as a matter of policy. They have said they consider it unwise for their electricity supply industry to be dependent upon foreign manufacturers for spares and maintenance. And they are absolutely right. In fact, none of the nations which manufacture heavy power equipment consider it wise to equip their own power systems with foreign-made machines for the same good reason. So why is it heresy for the United States to follow the same sound reasoning? How can it even be good for our Government foreign policy if it is not good for America?

This whole matter is coming up for another decision shortly, I understand, when the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization acts on a petition supported by the National Electrical Manufacturers Association. This petition calls for restricting the import of just four specific types of key heavy power apparatus by our Government. This would not apply to most of the electrical industry's production—just four products in the heavy power apparatus category. It is high time such action be taken. Our national security is involved and this action could stop a trend of foreign procurement that threatens to ultimately put the Nation's electric power system at the mercy of foreign lands.

Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, February 12, I sent telegrams to President Eisenhower, to General Vogel, Chairman of the TVA Board, and to Mr. Leo Hoegh, Director of the Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization, protesting the TVA decision to award this large steam turbine generator to a foreign concern. Also, I received a telegram from local 601 of the IUE-AFL-CIO protesting this action by TVA and the administration. I am placing in the RECORD at this point copies of all of these telegrams:

FEBRUARY 12, 1959.

The Honorable DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER,
President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.:

I have protested to the Chairman of the Board of the Tennessee Valley Authority and to the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization regarding a recent announcement that the Tennessee Valley Authority has awarded a contract to Parsons Electric Co., Ltd., a British manufacturer, for a very large steam turbine electric generator.

I believe such an award to a foreign company violates the national security interests of the United States, and that it represents Government procurement policy which is difficult to comprehend in view of the serious unemployment which exists in Pennsylvania and other States where American manufacturers of heavy electric equipment are located.

I respectfully urge that you promptly revise the policies of your administration which permit the awarding of a contract to very low paid British employees while American workers are so badly in need of work.

Respectfully,

CONGRESSMAN ELMER J. HOLLAND,
30th District, Pennsylvania.

FEBRUARY 12, 1959.

The Honorable HERBERT D. VOGEL,
Chairman of the Board,
Tennessee Valley Authority,
Knoxville, Tenn.:

Have just learned you have awarded a contract to Parsons Electric Co., Ltd., a British company, for the manufacture of a 500,000 kilowatt steam turbine generator, and that the low evaluated domestic bidder was Westinghouse Electric Corp.

I urgently request that TVA reconsider this action in order not to deprive Pennsylvania workers of nearly 700 man-years of employment.

Furthermore, I regard the award of this contract to a foreign firm by an agency of the United States, which is financed by public funds, as a serious violation of sound public policy.

I also believe the procurement of such a machine from a foreign country is violative of the national security interests of the United States.

I urge that the award to the British concern be canceled and given to the low evaluated American bidder.

Congressman ELMER J. HOLLAND,
30th District, Pennsylvania.

FEBRUARY 12, 1959.

The Honorable LEO A. HOEGH,
Director, Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, Washington, D.C.:

Have just learned that Tennessee Valley Authority has awarded contract to Parsons Electric Co., Ltd., a British manufacturer, for a 500,000 kilowatt steam turbine generator for installation in the TVA electric system.

I believe that the addition of this foreign-made generating equipment to your system, which already has a heavy concentration of foreign-made electrical equipment in it, is to jeopardize the national security interests of the United States.

I urge that you promptly advise the Tennessee Valley Authority that this steam turbine generator should be manufactured by an American concern because of the jeopardy to TVA power facilities and because of the importance of maintaining a healthy American electrical manufacturing industry.

While this steam turbine machine is not included in the pending electrical industry petitions which are pending before you, it involves the same serious national security principles, and I trust that you will promptly render a ruling on the pending petitions to provide adequate protection to the national security interests of this country, and that you will include such a ruling with respect to steam turbine generators even though the latter are not a part of this petition.

Congressman ELMER J. HOLLAND,
30th District, Pennsylvania.

PITTSBURGH, PA., February 12, 1959.

Hon. ELMER HOLLAND,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.:

We understand that a contract for a large steam turbine generator has been given to the G. A. Parsons & Co., Ltd., of England, rather than to Westinghouse, which was the lowest American bidder. This order would have given thousands of man-hours of work to our members here at East Pittsburgh, where more than 3,000 are now unemployed and living off unemployment compensation. Many of these have 17 years of service. Our members who are still employed are sharing time and drawing half wages. If it our Government's policy to create employment in other countries at the expense of our own welfare, then something must be done. We find it difficult to satisfactorily explain to the unemployed members of our union that our Government has seen fit to contract their type of work to people in other countries. We would appreciate knowing your position on this vital matter that, in effect, means food on the table for our members. It is regrettable that we find ourselves calling this matter to your attention, for up to now we have assumed that our respected and responsible Government officials would be looking after the best interests of American workingmen who are also, after all, both voters and taxpayers—although, at present, it seems that this is completely forgotten. We demand that an immediate investigation be made of this shortsighted policy and that corrective measures be taken immediaately to alleviate what has developed into critical unemployment conditions in our area.

Hon. ELMER HOLLAND,
U.S. Representative,
Washington, D.C.:

Resolution sent by wire this date our membership of 5,500 Westinghouse Electric salaried employees respectfully urge your influence in proposing congressional investigation into policies of TVA. While thousands of Westinghouse workers remain idle in a labor-surplus area TVA awards a multimillion dollar turbogenerator contract to a foreign competitor, while Westinghouse was the lowest domestic bidder. This contract would have provided 700 Westinghouse employees approximately 2 years of work. This policy not only affects business and economy of the Nation, it results in loss of tax income for the Government and could endanger the security of our country.

THOMAS E. O'LEARY,
President, Association of Westinghouse Salaried Employees.

Mr. PAUL CARMICHAEL, President,
Mr. TOM SULLIVAN, Business Agent,
JAMES FERACK, Chief Steward,
Local 601, IUE–AFL–CIO,
East Pittsburgh, Pa.:

Retel have protested to the President of the United States, the Chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization the award of this contract instead of to Westinghouse.

Am mailing you copies of my telegrams.

CONGRESSMAN ELMER J. HOLLAND.

A WORD OF PRAISE FOR THE ARMY ENGINEERS

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, in the short time it has been my privilege to serve in this body, I have noticed that our Members more often rise to complain than to compliment. As a matter of fact on January 29 this year in a report on the flood disaster in my district involving a break in the dike of the Kokosing River at Mount Vernon, Ohio, I took the U.S. Army Engineers to task for delays on a survey report of the project which had been pending for years.

I pointed out then that unless immediate action was taken to repair the dike, the people of Mount Vernon might very well suffer a devastating reoccurrence of the January 21 disaster. My colleagues, I am extremely happy to stand before you today to tell you that the Army Engineers responded to the needs of our people promptly—cut red-tape—set to work without delay to provide the necessary dike repairs. You will understand why I am so pleased to commend the engineers today when I tell you that their ready response to the crisis created by the flood of January 21 in fact played a major part in averting another catastrophe in Mount Vernon when floods struck Ohio again on February 10. As a tribute to the engineers, I quote from a headline story in the Mount Vernon News for February 11, 1959, entitled "Newly Repaired Dike Saves City."

But while the crest was lower, the west side of Mount Vernon was saved from another disastrous flooding only because of the fast work done by the city and Federal Governments in getting dike repairs started after the breaches made January 21.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to further report that our Army Engineers are, in addition to the Kokosing project, currently considering emergency repairs to the levee on nearby Dry Creek, also in Mount Vernon. Here is what the Mount Vernon News said about Dry Creek on February 11:

In Mount Vernon, yesterday's floodwaters from Dry Creek got onto Main Street at Newark Road, but were held back by sandbag barriers. Homes were flooded in the Memorial Park area and on Columbus Road, but there was no water in the business section.

Further in connection with Dry Creek in Mount Vernon, I quote from a statement from Mr. Harry S. Wright, chairman of the Knox County Board of Commissioners, dated February 12, 1959:

We listened yesterday to telephone calls one after the other from mothers, fathers and merchants, pleading that we do something to relieve this situation from recurring in the future along the levee between Dry Creek and the Columbus Road.

Mr. Speaker, as in the case of the Kokosing breakthrough, I have every reason to believe that the Army Engineers will, in accordance with our request, proceed promptly to do what needs to be done to repair the levee on Dry Creek so that our homeowners may sleep at night with a feeling of freedom from destruction.

And, too, Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that the Engineers and all other agencies of government will be as equally understanding and helpful as we project our plans into the future with a view to permanent control of floodwaters to the cities of Newark, Fredericktown, and other areas throughout the 17th Congressional District.

THE 10-PERCENT FEDERAL TAX ON TRANSPORTATION OF PERSONS SHOULD BE REPEALED

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, on January 17, I introduced H.R. 1364, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Act of 1954 to repeal the tax presently imposed on the transportation of persons.

During the 85th Congress, the 3-percent excise tax on the transportation of property was repealed but unfortunately its counterpart, the 10-percent tax on travelers, was retained.

All of us are familiar, I am sure, with the original purposes of this tax which was imposed in 1941 as a temporary measure to help fill revenue needs and to discourage the general public's use of the airlines, railroads, and buses during World War II. Despite the fact that the reasons for imposing this tax have disappeared, it is unfortunately still with us. We must rid ourselves of it now.

If we ever lose the ability to move quickly and safely from one place to another, either in this country or throughout the world, we as a nation will be as impotent as you and I would be if we lose our ability to walk or talk. There is no doubt about our transportation industry's essentiality and importance to the economy of the country. The general public needs adequate and modern travel facilities. Our transportation system must continue to move forward and expand not only to prepare for the predicted 60 million increase in our population by 1975 but in fact even to exist in this age of electronics and atomic energy. No deterrent should be allowed to stand in the way which might discourage the general public from using common carriers to the limit of their capacity. The 10 percent tax on travel is just such a deterrent and should be repealed as quickly as possible.

By discouraging travel on commercial carriers, the tax places a heavy burden upon one of the Nation's most vital industries. The American transportation system is the envy of the world. During the Korean conflict and World War II, it performed a tremendous job of speedily and efficiently transporting essential personnel and material. If another national emergency should develop, the industry would again be asked to perform miracles of transportation while the automobile would again be curtailed as a luxury this Nation couldn't afford. Public carriers must be prepared.

To be ready for a national emergency requires the most efficient use of our economic resources. One of the most important ways to accomplish this is to fully utilize and properly maintain our commercial transportation system. The existence of such a system in periods of limited resources depends upon its being permitted to use its facilities economically in periods of abundant resources, a fact too often overlooked. We should therefore encourage the growth of a sound and healthy common carrier system rather than discourage, by tax, the use of such industry's facilities on the part of the traveling public.

Here is a tax that no one has testified is good, fair, or beneficial. It is equally disliked by all regulated carriers and the traveling public. Members of Congress, executives of our airlines, railroads, intercity buslines and shipping companies, trade association officials and the man of the street have all appeared at one time or another before congressional committees urging its repeal. I cannot understand why, if the income derived from the tax amounts to about $200 million a year, Congress refuses to repeal it, particularly when many economists have stated that it is very probable that the Government stands to collect more revenue through increased use of our public carriers.

And do we realize that the effect of this tax on passengers adds to today's already high cost of living. Let me show you how. Since one-third of passenger transportation, it has been conservatively estimated, is for necessary business travel, the taxes on transportation will be included in operating expenses of the companies incurring them and passed on, at least partially, in the pricing of their products. The cost of collecting the tax is borne by the carriers and is included in operating expenses and thus affects the level of fares. And finally inadequate passenger revenues in the case of the railroads must be recovered from freight transportation by increases in rates. So here we have a tax which is not only unnecessary but also inflationary.

Another objectionable feature of the tax is that its burden is greater on the low-income families which spend most if not all of their income on the necessities of life. This group, consisting of about one-third of the families in the United States, it has been estimated, have no other means of travel than our common carriers. For them travel is not a luxury but a necessity and the travel tax which is collected by common carriers competes with the food and clothing dollar.

Not only does this 10 percent tax discriminate against the low income families but because it was imposed as a penalty surcharge, only on travel furnished by for-hire carriers, the tax is inherently discriminatory. As originally enacted, the tax applied to all amounts paid within the United States for transportation by rail, motor vehicle, water or air. This was not unfair in the beginning because there was no discrimination between competing carriers although it did give an advantage to the automobiles which, however, during the war was practically nonexistent. If, as expected, the tax had been repealed at the end of World War II, the inherent discrimination of the tax could not have developed fully. Instead, gas rationing, the device used to discourage private travel, was terminated and the travel tax was and is still being continued.

To make the tax further discriminatory, Congress has amended the law on several occasions so that today only travel within the continental United States and a 225-mile buffer zone is subjected to the tax. International travel is thus encouraged at the expense of domestic travel. Millions of dollars have been spent on our national parks for the benefit of Americans, and they, with our foreign guests, must pay a penalty to visit these places by train, airline, or bus. This is a curious and unhealthy situation.

The effect of the tax in discouraging travel in the United States by commercial means is very visibly demonstrated by the change in the character of intercity travel between 1946, the first full postwar year, and 1958. In 1946 common carriers transported 27 percent of all intercity travelers. Today this figure has dropped to slightly more than 10 percent in spite of the fact that total intercity miles have almost doubled during the 12-year period. How are people getting from city to city? Almost 90 percent of them are traveling with their families in the automobile which is not subjected to the travel tax.

This drop in intercity mileage which our large common carriers have experienced is extremely detrimental to the future of our transportation industry. With the airlines trying valiantly to find the money to order new jet airplanes, with the railroads' passenger car fleet totally inadequate for an emergency according to the Department of the Army, and with revenue of the bus companies—about 80 percent of which are small business—inadequate to cope with rising costs, why does the Congress of the United States, by refusing to repeal the travel tax, not recognize that it is fostering unsound economic conditions in the transportation industry and inadequacy of the transportation plant to meet the needs of commerce and national defense? The travel tax is in derogation of the national transportation policy which is spelled out in the Interstate Commerce Act. How much longer can we go on talking out of both sides of our months at once? Let us let our right hand act in concert with our left. Let us keep our transportation system second to none—one that is ready at all times for anything that might come. Let us repeal immediately the 10 percent tax on the transportation of persons.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, the Lithuanians are one of the old nationality groups which have had a long and glorious history. At the end of the 18th century they lost their national independence to the Russian czarist regime, but on February 16, 1918—41 years ago today—they again regained their freedom and proclaimed their independence.

The Lithuanians enjoyed their independence for 22 years and lived in peace and happiness. They rebuilt their little country on the Baltic Sea and created a truly democratic way of life in their homeland. But after the outbreak of World War II, tiny Lithuania was quickly occupied by the Soviet Union. Harsh and brutal measures were imposed upon it and the defenseless little country soon was incorporated into the imperialistic giant from the east.

Since those sad days Lithuanian independence has continued to live in the hearts and minds of liberty-loving and patriotic Lithuanians and all their many friends. We in the free world salute these inspiring sentiments and pledge our efforts to support the cause of freedom and liberty in all the world.

LITHUANIA, LATVIA, AND ESTONIA

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HIESTAND. Mr. Speaker, Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia became independent nations just 41 years ago today, and enjoyed two decades of freedom and progress. During these years a number of agreements were signed with the Soviet Union which were supposed to guarantee the sovereignty and integrity of these three Baltic States. However, in 1939 a "mutual assistance" pact was signed—under duress by the three states—which resulted in the stationing of Soviet forces in these countries. In June of 1940 the Soviets demanded that the Baltic States reorganize their governments, and that governments more friendly to the Soviet be established.

The Baltic States had little choice but to comply and new governments were formed. At that time the Soviet Union commenced military occupation of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. This was the end of freedom and self-government. Rigged elections were staged for the legislatures of the Baltic States and in July, 1940, the States were incorporated into the Soviet Union as Soviet Socialist Republics.

The United States, in 1940, refused to recognize the action of the Soviet Union in forcibly incorporating these free nations into their Union. Today, we still maintain this position and recognize in this country the diplomatic representatives of the last free governments of the Baltic States. The United States continues to believe that the peoples of these countries have the right to determine their own political, economic, and cultural systems, and the U.S. Government is confident that the determination, industry, and love of freedom of the peoples of the Baltic States will make it possible for them to regain the freedom and independence of which they were so unjustly deprived.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, on this 41st anniversary of Lithuania's independence it is fitting that this House pause in its proceedings to honor a people dedicated to freedom and liberty. Nearly 19 years have passed since Soviet forces ruthlessly swept over her borders and forcibly sealed Lithuania behind the Iron Curtain. Yet we can be certain that the Communists have not been able to snuff out the love of freedom that burns deeply within the hearts of all Lithuanians.

The tragic plight of Lithuania and her sister Baltic States is a source of concern to all freedom-loving peoples around the world. While we cannot know fully the nature of the indignities and inhumanities their inhabitants have been forced to undergo, we realize their sufferings are great. So long as the Soviet Union continues to hold these states in subjection, their people will be deprived of the precious liberties they once knew.

On February 16, 1918, the State of Lithuania became an independent democratic Republic. Her people were accorded the constitutional rights of freedom of speech and assembly; freedom of religion was guaranteed; land reforms were instituted and industrial expansion undertaken. For 22 years the Republic of Lithuania took its rightful place in the family of free nations and made marked contributions to the culture of Europe. During this time the Lithuanian people demonstrated that democracy was both possible and practical in a small country.

In June 1940, the Soviet Union cruelly seized Lithuania and proceeded to incorporate her territory into the U.S.S.R. This action was quickly denounced by the U.S. Government which has consistently refused to recognize any such forcible annexation. We believe that the people of Lithuania have an inherent right to choose their own political, economic, and cultural systems.

On this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence I am happy to join with my colleagues and the million Americans of Lithuanian descent in paying tribute to a brave and courageous people. Their resolute faith in Almighty God and their great love of liberty has not waivered, even in the face of Communist tyrannies. With them we pray that the day will not be far distant when they will again know and experience the priceless joys of a free society.

GOVERNMENT BUYING OF FOREIGN-MADE ELECTRICAL EQUIPMENT

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include pertinent material in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, the recent decisions concerning Government buying of foreign made electrical equipment may be the straw that will break the camel's back.

For years a small minority have been fighting reciprocal trades, foreign aid, and so forth. I have not always been a member of this group. However, the latest development in this field is adding recruits by the thousands.

There can be no legitimate excuse for such action as that which gave England and Switzerland millions of dollars worth of orders for Government work.

I for one will not go along with this policy if it means the loss of American jobs or American prosperity.

Following are telegrams received and sent by me further explaining our situation:

FEBRUARY 4, 1959.

Mr. DAVID HILL,
Administrator, REA, Washington, D.C.:

Pursuant to my telephone conversation, I herewith officially and vigorously protest the awarding turbine generator contract the Medina Electric Corp. to Switzerland. The Elliott Co. in Jeannette, Pa., seriously affected by this decision. Entire community considered serious labor surplus area and every man-hour payroll denied means that much more in local taxes, local loss of business, and local relief rolls. This matter goes deeper than a mere acquiring of machinery and seriously affects the economic and moral fiber of our way of life. Governments by their taxing powers are rapidly destroying the competitive quality of American manufacturers and the unrestrictive right grants competition for country to bid on American requirements, especially in nontaxpaying corporations and Government purchasing sets an example that can be and is in some quarters, destructive and devastating to our economic well-being. I request a delay in the granting of this contract and that the work be given to American workingmen and American plants.

Sincerely,

JOHN H. DENT,
Member of Congress.

JEANNETTE, PA., February 5, 1959.

Hon. JOHN H. DENT,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Our members in locals 1145 and 2380 are greatly disturbed over rumors going around Jeannette regarding Government purchases or Government approval to purchase foreign made turbine generator units. We asked Elliott management for facts regarding this situation and they are as follows: "Recently Medina Electric Cooperative at Hando, Tex., took bids on two 22,000-kilowatt turbine generator units with an opinion on third duplicate unit. Four domestic and one foreign bid were received. Developments indicate Medina expects to award the order to Brown-Boveri who would manufacture this equipment abroad. All awards by cooperatives are subject to REA Administrator approval in Washington. Elliott advises they made a serious attempt to secure this business in view of the reduced operations at both the Jeannette and Ridgway plants." At the Jeannette plant we have over 50 percent of our people on layoff, and an additional layoff is scheduled for the end of this week. At Ridgway plant over 60 percent are on layoff. We hope you will do everything possible to prevent approval of this award to a foreign bidder. While we do not know if Elliott would be the successful domestic bidder, such an award to them would mean many man-hours' work for the people in Jeannette and Ridgway. Your help is earnestly solicited.

President, Local 2380 United Steel Workers of America,
WILLIAM P. WEIGHTMAN,
President Local 1145, United Steel Workers of America.

Mr. RIGGS SHEPPARD,
Medina Electric Corp., Hando, Tex.:

Unemployed workers of Elliott Co. in Jeannette, Pa., appeal to you through me for reconsideration of generator order apparently destined to go to Switzerland. We have less than 40 percent production with acute unemployment production. This order desperately needed to help local employment and business.

JOHN H. DENT,
Member of Congress, 21st District of Pennsylvania.

PITTSBURGH, PA., February 12, 1959.

Hon. JOHN H. DENT,
House of Representatives:

We understand that a contract for a large steam turbine generator has been given to the C. A. Parsons & Co., Ltd., of England, rather than to Westinghouse, which was the lowest American bidder. This order would have given thousands of man-hours of work to our members here at East Pittsburgh where more than 3,000 are now unemployed and living off unemployment compensation. Many of these have 17 years of service. Our members who are still employed are sharing time and drawing half wages. If it is our Government's policy to create employment in other countries at the expense of our own welfare, then something must be done. We find it difficult to satisfactorily explain to the unemployed members of our union that our Government has seen fit to contract their type of work to people in other countries. We would appreciate knowing your position on this vital matter that, in effect, means food on the table for our members. It is regrettable that we find ourselves calling this matter to your attention, for up to now, we have assumed that our respected and responsible Government officials would be looking after the best interests of American workingmen, who are also, after all, both voters and taxpayers. As a direct result of the 4-year extension of reciprocal trades and the President's Executive order cutting bid differential between foreign and American producers and manufacturers from 25 percent to 6 percent, many American industries have been and are being forced to lay off American workmen. Examples: According to information wired me from representatives of the Westinghouse Corp., Pittsburgh, they have just lost $18 million order to England, and Elliott Co., Jeannette, Pa., appears to be losing contract for $2 million for generators. I sincerely believe the time has come to reevaluate our position in world trade, reciprocal trades, foreign aid, and their relationship to our chronic and growing unemployment. Received your wire. Have investigated said order. Your facts correct. This order would have meant $18 million worth of work for American workmen. Have the same situation for $2 million worth of work for Elliott Co., Jeannette. This generator contract will be awarded to Switzerland concern. My position was clearly stated when I voted against reciprocal trades during my first year as Congressman. My remarks of opposition have been in the RECORD time after time. I have been disturbed about the number of labor union executives who are in favor of reciprocal trades and unrestricted foreign aid. This condition caused by Executive order of the President which cut the 25-percent differential previously allowed American producers to 6 percent. I have pointed out that the 6-percent differential does not even cover the mandated costs through payroll deductions American industries must bear. The time has come for mass demonstrations against the loss of American jobs to revive national pride through buy American. The discouraging thing about this order is that the equipment is being purchased by TVA which is Government subsidized through Government taxation and pays no taxes itself. Rest assured, I shall protest vigorously to Congress in our next session on Monday. It appears that the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 10, opposses my fighting the granting of awards of contracts to foreign countries. It appears to be in favor of the Westinghouse and others losing contracts to foreign countries.

AWARDS AND ALARMS

Congressman JOHN DENT acted as a proper spokesman for his constituency when he protested a Government contract award to a Swiss firm for two turbine generators which a firm in Jeannette, Pa., had bid on building. The relevant Government agency replied that it would review the award.

This same Swiss firm figured in a different case not long ago when it won out as low bidder on a contract for TVA. In reply to a protesting American firm, TVA pointed out that it would save between 35 and 40 percent by accepting the Swiss bid.

Recently there was a well-publicized case in which the Government rejected the bid of an English electrical firm in favor of a much higher bid by a Philadelphia firm. The Government said in that case that it acted in the interests of national security. Chances are, though, it acted primarily out of concern for domestic jobs.

That, of course, is a legitimate concern. The Government has for some time held that when competing with a domestic firm located in an area of substantial unemployment, a foreign bidder must undercut the lowest American bid by 12 percent to win the award. The English firm which lost out to the one in Philadelphia had bid lower by some 17 percent.

In the case concerning Jeannette, it remains to be seen whether Representative DENT and others will be able to alter the award to the Swiss firm. But if this case should go so far as to be reviewed in the light of national security—a sometimes suspect light in questions of trade—the Government should keep in mind that national security can also be hurt by hurting U.S. relations with friendly nations and by offending the cause of liberalized trade among free nations.

WASHINGTON, D.C., February 13, 1959.
The EDITOR,
Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Pittsburgh, Pa.:

Your article on proposed award of bid to Swiss for generators called to my attention. I just learned that the differential in the bids was 12 percent. However, Medina Electric has chosen to disregard economic factor and appears to be standing on basis of Presirent's Executive order allowing only 6 percent. Your help in this matter can aid the workers of the city of Jeannette who are fighting for their jobs. Might suggest looking into multimillion-dollar order Westinghouse lost to English concern this week. Sorry to say, there is no hard-and-fast rule on the awarding of contracts in cases such as this. Political preference appears to carry weight. Will elaborate if so desired.

SALT-WATER RESEARCH LABORATORY AT SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs be discharged from further consideration of H.R. 4402, to provide for the construction of a salt-water research laboratory at Seattle, Wash. It is the sense of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs that this bill properly comes within the scope and jurisdiction of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be re-referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

There was no objection.

SPENDING OTHER PEOPLE'S MONEY

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily it is not in order to ask a colleague to read your remarks. But I am asking that the Members of the House read the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, the Honorable JIM WRIGHT, found on pages 2171–2172 of the February 9 RECORD, where he tells about the interest on the national debt.

The very last two paragraphs should be read. They add the thought that I had in mind this morning, which is this: The easiest thing in the world is to give away the other fellow's money. Buy favor with the earnings and savings of others. Of course that is what we have been doing.

Far be it from me to question the inclination or the courage of the Congress, but I am wondering, in view of what the gentleman from Texas said in those last two paragraphs, if it is true that we lack either the inclination or the courage, one or the other, to quit spending. Just borrow and spend and then pass the debt on to future generations. Stop and think about that a minute. Is it not a cowardly procedure to endeavor to gain approval at the expense of others?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

LITHUANIA

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to revise and extend their remarks in the body of the RECORD immediately following my remarks on this same subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, following the custom and practice which has been customary and usual in this body for many years; that is, to use this forum of the greatest and freest legislative body in the world, to pay tribute to the freedom and independence and hoped-for liberty of a liberty-loving people from an ancient homeland, who have at the same time done much for our country, I speak of the free Republic of Lithuania. This is a great nation. In our own blood and sinews are the blood and sinews and traditions and customs of peoples of all nations of the world.

I would look forward years in advance to that time when there would be a new people in the world, this new breed with God's blessing, this new race, the American race, which will have in it all the best elements of all these great people. It is not unusual that we say this about Lithuania here because down through the weeks of this session we will say much the same of many other peoples and many other nations that have made and will make us great.

The sense of this body today, I am sure, is that the freedom of all freedom-loving peoples of the world are joined in our hope and the aspiration that one day this Lithuanian Republic freed from the yoke of the foreign tyrant will be able to achieve its destiny in liberty.

To those of Lithuanian extraction in America and to all inhabitants of enslaved Lithuania we take this occasion to reaffirm our pledge of self-determination for all peoples, for all states.

It is idle to speak of peace when whole nations are ground under the heel of tyranny. It is a mockery to talk of negotiations looking to an equitable solution of the issues dividing the East and the West when valiant nations like Lithuania are held in stern and brutal subjection.

It has been well said that foreign policy is forged on the anvil of public discussion, that public opinion is a determining factor in determining policy. Let all take note then that the rank and file of Americans, of all national origins, look with abhorrence on the enslavement of Lithuania.

Today what we say in this assembly will be heard round the world. We call upon liberty-loving people the world over to remember that the Red heel came down with crushing brutality and terrorism in 1944, that the brief flame of rewon Lithuanian independence was tragically snuffed out and Lithuania has been held a prisoner nation to this day in defiance and violation of the principles of the Atlantic Charter and the Charter of the United Nations.

Above and beyond that, the enslavement of Lithuania is in violation of the spirit of equity among the community of nations, does great violence to international morality, and is a constant affront to the conscience of the world.

Just as the great Lincoln, whose memory was so reverently and poignantly honored in this Chamber last week, said that a nation "cannot endure half free and half slave," so we say today in the name of Lithuania, as we address ourselves to the aggressors and tyrants: The world cannot endure half free and half slave.

To the Red tyrants who have forcibly impressed once free Lithuania into the Soviet Imperialist Empire we say: Do not try to inveigle us to a so-called peace conference so long as you hold Lithuania and other once-free states in terroristic captivity.

America, the world, the conscience of mankind will never recognize Soviet supremacy over Lithuania; in the fervent prayer and belief that God is still in His heaven and will one day make all things right with the world, we confidently look forward to the day when Lithuania will once again take her place among the free nations of the world.

We can be sure that the anniversary of Lithuanian independence will be remembered in Lithuania. But there will be no festivities—no gay bunting, no unfurled flags, no music—to commemorate it. Rather, it will still be observed in mute if defiant silence, or perhaps in reconsecration to those ideals, to those ways of life which the Lithuanian people cherish.

In this country, on the contrary, the day will be openly celebrated by the nearly one million Lithuanian Americans who are scattered throughout the States of the Union. Here in this blessed land of freedom these, our fellow-Americans, will, as they have in the past, take occasion to remember their oppressed kinsmen across the oceans and to solemnly pledge again their spiritual and moral support for their eventual liberation.

In this pledge all Americans can join them. We can join them further in the faith and hope that the day of liberation will not be too far distant—that soon the merciless domination of Soviet tyranny will be forced to withdraw or be dissolved.

Such hope for Lithuania and the other captive nations of Eastern Europe is predicated on progress toward a united Europe. A free and united Western Europe could exert such power only and exercise such attraction toward, the eastern captive half as to loosen the bonds of Soviet Communist imperialism and cause the Soviets to withdraw to their own frontiers. Every step toward the unity and the economic and political strength of Europe is therefore a step toward the liberation of these captive peoples.

If we view events in Europe in this light we can be optimistic about the future, for Western Europe is making great strides toward unity and strength. Already the pull toward the West has caused deep unrest in Eastern Germany, has loosened Soviet bonds in Poland, and has lighted the bright beacons of the 1956 Hungarian revolution. The magnet of free West Berlin has further infected the Communist body politic and has caused the Soviet Union to demand a showdown on this symbolic city's continued existence. All of these are signs of severe tensions in the Communist empire that may result in greater freedoms in Eastern Europe.

And so, as we celebrate Lithuania's independence day, we can take hope for the future.

The rape of Lithuania's independence almost two decades ago was one of the worst outrages of our day, and that dastardly act remains as one of the blackest marks which the Soviet Union has earned by its treacherous behavior, particularly when dealing with its weak and innocent neighbors. The methods by which Soviet authorities engineered the signature of a mutual assistance pact with Lithuania early in 1940; the way they stationed Red army forces in all strategic points of the country; how they accused patriotic Lithuanians of sabotage and anti-Soviet activities; how they maneuvered to set up a government totally subservient to their interests, which soon brought Lithuania into the Soviet Union; in all these moves and acts the then Soviet Dictator Stalin rivaled his partner in Berlin.

The Lithuanians had created their first independent state some 700 years ago, in 1253. Since those distant days, Lithuania's long and turbulent history has followed a rather uneven course; it has had its ups and down. That history is marked by greatness and glory during its first few centuries, while misfortune and misery claim a large part in the lives of Lithuanians during most of the last 200 years. During the 14th and 15th centuries, Lithuania became one of the most powerful and great states in all eastern and northern Europe. In the 16th century it was united with Poland under a Lithuanian king, and from then on the fate of the countries were bound together. Late in the 18th century, when Poland lost her independence and most of that country was incorporated into Czarist Russia, Lithuania shared a similar fate. Then for more than a century and a half these stalwart and stout-hearted Lithuanians suffered under the unrelenting Russian regime, though not for a moment did they lose sight of the prime objective they had as their common goal—the attainment of their national political independence.

Toward the end of the First World War, when Russia's czarist regime was overthrown by the revolution, and the new Communist regime had not shown its ugly and inhuman nature, the Lithuanians proclaimed their independence on February 16, 1918. They set up a republic, and a truly democratic form of government was instituted which ruled the new state for two decades. For a score of years Lithuanians enjoyed their hard-earned freedom, worked hard in the task of rebuilding their war-ravaged country, and made significant progress. In this rebuilding and also in reshaping of their destiny they were aided by their friends everywhere, especially by Americans of Lithuanian descent in this country. Then came the Second World War and Lithuania's woes began to multiply. She became one of the earliest victims of that war.

Since then, except for the equally unhappy interregnum of Nazi occupation for about 2 years, unfortunate Lithuanians have been under the heels of heartless Russian Communists. There they are sealed off from the outside world, from their friends in the free world, and suffer in one huge prison camp, fated to work as slaves for their bosses in the Kremlin. No one is allowed to know of their tragic fate, and none of them is allowed to get out to tell his or her own sad tale. But having heard so many heartrending true stories from peoples suffering under the same cruel masters, we know what they have gone through and what they are likely to endure before they are free. As long as there is no relaxation of the unrelenting Soviet rule over them, they will not know what freedom is, and, much as they strive and wish to have it, it is denied to them by their Communist taskmasters. On this 41st anniversary I join hands with all loyal and patriotic Americans of Lithuanian descent and echo their genuine sentiments and feelings, expressing the hope that some day they also have the freedom to celebrate this memorable day, the Lithuanian Independence Day, in their homeland.

LITHUANIAN "GOLGOTHA"

EDITOR, TIMES-LEADER NEWS:

This year, Americans of Lithuanian ancestry celebrate the 300th anniversary of Lithuanian immigration to the United States. The first Lithuanian immigrant to reach the shores of America was Alexander Carolus Curtius. He was the founder of schools and the first teacher of classics in the Dutch colony of New Amsterdam, today's New York.

Most of the Lithuanian immigrants settled in Pennsylvania. Although they were agricultural people in their native land, yet arriving on these shores they went into the coal mines and steel mills of America, contributing their brain and brawn to the making of America.

All these Americans of Lithuanian ancestry, 1 million in all, celebrate this weekend all over America the 41st anniversary of the proclamation of the independence of the country of their forefathers on February 16, 1918, this independence which was destroyed by Soviet Russia in 1940.

The situation which the Baltic countries—Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia—have endured throughout the whole written history of Europe, so many vicissitudes of conquest, oppression and tyrannical despotism, has never been so desperate, so painful as now, under the ruthless domination of Soviet Russian regime.

The leaders of these small countries have been executed or exiled. Their farmers have been snatched from their lands and deported. Their folks have been cruelly wrested from their homes, forcibly separated from their families, broken in body and spirit and reduced to vassalage. No darker drama of tyranny and lust has ever been performed on the stage of civilization than the present tragedy of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia.

Lithuania and her two Baltic sister Republics, Latvia and Estonia, are victims of flagrant violation of international treaties. U.S. Senate Internal Security Subcommittee studied recently nearly 1,000 treaties and agreements which the Soviets have entered into with countries all over the world. The committee found that in the short years since the Soviet Russia came into existence, in 1917, its government has broken its word to virtually every country to which it ever gave a signed promise. The Soviet Union signed treaty of recognition, friendship, and nonaggression with Lithuania and cynically broke those agreements and absorbed Lithuania and the other Baltic countries.

This brings us to the fundamental issue that faces the peoples of the world: Are the international treaties signed by the Soviet Union worth anything? And what can the nations of the world do to see that the agreements are kept? The eyes of the Lithuanian people, along with all others, are today turned toward America to find the answer.

COMMITTEE FOR THE CELEBRATION OF THE 41ST ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY, Worcester, Mass., February 11, 1959.

DEAR HONORABLE SIR: It was on February 16, 1918, that Lithuania, one of the Baltic States, declared her independence to the entire world. Today Lithuania is not free for, in June 1940, her territory and institutions were unjustly seized by Soviet Russia. Since then her people have been undergoing a persecution and a tyranny, the like of which the world has not seen for many centuries.

Russia's seizure of Lithuania was so cruel and unjust that the Government of the United States has refused, even to this day, to recognize the de jure absorption of the country by the Soviet. For this we, American-Lithuanians, are and ever will be profoundly grateful.

On the occasion of the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day on February 16, 1959, may we reiterate our conviction, and that of freedom-loving peoples, that Lithuania, like all nations, has a God-given right to be free. No one may deprive her or any nation of that right. Yet Russia has done just that to Lithuania. She, therefore, must be condemned and must be forced to leave Lithuania at once and make provisions for the return to Lithuania of all her people. now exiled in Siberia and elsewhere.

Realizing your concern for the freedom of all nations, both large and small, may we, the representatives of the two Lithuanian parishes in Worcester, St. Casimir's and Our Lady of Vilna, and of the Lithuanian-American community of Worcester, comprising in all 55 Lithuanian groups, appeal to you to espouse the just and righteous cause of Lithuania in her struggle to regain freedom. May we kindly count on your generous assistance in every way possible for the eventual and, please God, immediate restoration of Lithuania's independence.

With our heartfelt appreciation for your cooperation, we beg to remain,

Respectfully yours,

J. W. GLAVICKAS,
Chairman.
OLGA O. KERSIS,
Secretary.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Harrisburg, February 11, 1959.

Gov. David L. Lawrence today issued the following statement, setting aside February 16, 1959, as Lithuanian Independence Day. In his statement, Governor Lawrence said:

"The observance of Lithuanian Independence Day will take place on February 16, 1959—the 41st anniversary of the reestablishment of independence in the Republic of Lithuania.

"This event is celebrated by American citizens of Lithuanian descent, although it cannot be observed in their native country, itself, because of its occupation by the Soviet Union.

"The spirit of independence still burns bright in these men and women and the contributions which they have made to the development of this Nation's democratic way of life have been many.

"In recognition of these contributions, and in recognition of the significance of this day to them and to all those who love freedom, I am designating February 16, 1959, as Lithuanian Independence Day for Pennsylvania."

STATEMENT BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE ON THE 41ST ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATIONS OF LITHUANIAN, LATVIAN, AND ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE

This year we commemorate the 41st anniversary of the declaration of independence of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. At this time, it is well for the free world to recall the step-by-step process by which the independence of the Baltic peoples was destroyed after two decades of freedom and progress.

In treaties with Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia signed in 1920, Soviet Russia pledged itself to renounce forever all rights of sovereignty in the three countries. Similar pledges were embodied in other agreements signed in the following two decades. The last agreements were pacts of mutual assistance, negotiated at the insistence of the Soviets in September and October 1939. These pacts authorized the stationing of Soviet forces in the Baltic States. The Soviet Minister of Foreign Affairs gave solemn assurances that the pacts were innocent and protective in nature, stating that they expressly stipulated the inviolability of the sovereignty of the Baltic States. During the weeks preceding the conclusion of the pacts, however, the U.S.S.R. had already signed secret protocols with Nazi Germany, which recognized the Baltic States as belonging in the Soviet sphere of influence. Immediately after the signing of the pacts of mutual assistance, the U.S.S.R. commenced sending troops into Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. In June 1940, the Soviets demanded that the Governments of the three Baltic States be reorganized, demands which the Baltic States were powerless to resist. The military occupation of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia began simultaneously with the formation of new governments. There followed rigged elections which resulted, in July of 1940, in the incorporation of the Baltic States, as Soviet Socialist Republics, into the Soviet Union.

The United States was quick to denounce this aggression, and refused to recognize the forced incorporation of the Baltic States into the U.S.S.R. Today, over 18 years later, we wish to assure the people of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia once more that they are not forgotten. The United States still aspires, in the words of the Atlantic Charter "to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] for yielding to me at this time. I wish to congratulate him upon his splendid inspiring address. I agree with what he has said.

I have great admiration for the very fine people of Lithuania.

Mr. Speaker, on this Monday, February 16, 1959, the free nations of the world and people everywhere living in freedom salute the courageous Baltic nation of Lithuania. This is the 41st anniversary of the national independence of Lithuania. After this independence was finally proclaimed in February 1918 the Lithuanian people had dreams of developing one of the most prosperous and progressive democracies in all Europe.

For more than two decades, the Lithuanian people diligently and ceaselessly labored to make their homeland a happy and peaceful place in which to live.

Although I do not desire at this time to speak of the great historical events in Lithuanian history, certainly the American people well know that the happy and cherished independence of Lithuania only lasted a few years. With envy and jealousy and suspicion, Communist Russia was not disposed to permit this brave little nation to continue in independent prosperity. Russia was determined to destroy it and in June of 1940 the Red army of Communist Russia marched into Lithuania, overran it, destroyed its political independence, and annexed it to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Since that day in June 1940, the Lithuanian people have not known political freedom. They have suffered under tyranny as only the Russian Communists can create it and make it unbearable.

For centuries, Lithuania was an independent nation composed of hardy, energetic Baltic people. Late in the 18th century, however, Lithuania lost its independence to Russia, and the homeland of the Lithuanian people became a part of the great Russian Empire. For over a hundred years, extending up to the Russian Revolution of 1917, Lithuania was under the regime of the autocratic czars of Russia whose harsh and oppressive rule over this long, long century tried to destroy all hopes and desires for independence.

The spirit and the desire to be free develops and grows within the hearts of men. It is not a quality that grows out of political independence. On the contrary, it is the quality upon which political freedom is based. The spirit and hopes of the Lithuanian people could not be destroyed, and over the long, long century of tyranny under the Russian czars, the fire of freedom and independence still burned in the hearts of the Lithuanian people. At the time of the Russian Revolution in 1917, this spirit burst into flame. Czarist Russia collapsed, and on February 16, 1918, the people of Lithuania declared their national independence once again.

Even though, however, we know this political independence lasted only 20 years, we know that in the hearts of the Lithuanian people it is still very much alive and burns with the vigor of a flaming torch. Suffering for more than 18 years under the oppressive and grinding heel of Soviet Russia, the Lithuanian people still retain their hopes for freedom and liberty. They continue to look forward to that day in the future when the spirit of freedom and peaceful association with their fellowmen will once again flourish throughout their country and Lithuania will take her place among the respected free nations of the world.

During these eventful years of crisis, I have had the honor to represent in the Congress the hallowed ground of America upon which the freedom of America and mankind was born. When the American farmers made their stand in 1776 on Lexington Common and at Concord Bridge, it was their conclusion and their decision that to be free was far more desirable than to live. They made their determination to make their stand to win freedom or to die. Today, on February 16, 1959, the American people know the spirit of freedom will burn on in the hearts of the Lithuanian people until it once again achieves victory. Like an active volcano the spirit of national freedom always will smolder its strength until it erupts and pours out over its enemies.

Proud and vigorous, with abundant courage, the Lithuanian people some day again will achieve this victory for independence. Over three million Lithuanians on this, their independence day, exist under the tyrannical dictatorship of ruthless communism. This tiny nation, smashed and crushed by the great giant Russia, as a powerful tank would crush a delicate vase, is still alive. It still possesses courage. It still possesses hope. It still possesses the burning fire of freedom. This courage, this hope, this faith, molded together, will some day reassemble the pieces of their delicate vase. Everywhere the Lithuanian people look to this hour of triumph.

Freemen everywhere join today with the Lithuanian people in their plans and in their confidence that this day of victory will soon occur.

In conclusion, surely the men of tyranny know that the flame of freedom can never be stamped out because it burns within the hearts of mankind.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join with my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania in his remarks on the occasion of this celebration of Lithuanian Independence Day.

In my district in my home city of Waterbury is one of the greatest concentrations of people of Lithuanian extraction in any section of the country. These people have made a vital and permanent contribution to our community and to our country. Their sturdy qualities, their capacity for work, and their civic virtues have joined with the contributions of people of other races to make an American whole which is greater than the sum of its parts.

I have known these people instinctively all my life. My father served many of them as a physician. I went to school with the children of the pioneer immigrants. I have played with them on the field of sport. I have served with them in public life, and I have dealt with them in business. In all these fields they have been outstanding and have demonstrated the highest qualities of American citizenship.

To my mind, however, Mr. Speaker, the most important characteristic of these Lithuanian people and their descendants has been their capacity to become assimilated in the American population and to contribute their vital strength to the whole Nation.

No one who is familiar with the history of Lithuania can be surprised at the record of the people of this race in the United States. Through the centuries Lithuanians showed their qualities of courage and tenacity and their love of independence. The fostering and continuance of their historic language has been an example of the way in which they have preserved cultural values in this destructive world.

With the achievement of independence in 1918, came the true flowering of Lithuanian greatness. Under the sun of liberty, the basic qualities which I have described bloomed and grew. A strong and free Lithuania in those years made a substantial and noteworthy contribution to the welfare of the world. Then, tragically, the heel of tyranny descended upon the neck of this unfortunate country. Today, the Russian dictatorship holds Lithuania in thrall. Freedom has been destroyed. Free institutions have been smashed. Religion is being systematically persecuted. Civil rights no longer have any meaning. Daily we hear reports of cruel persecutions and callous disregard of human rights which we in this blessed country can scarcely believe possible.

We in this country cannot remain uncommitted in this tragic situation. Of course, our sympathies are with the Lithuanian people. Of course, we hope and pray that they will not longer suffer under the force of absolutism. But we must do more than hope and pray. We must continue to make our sentiments clear. We must let the world know where we stand. Finally, we must take every legitimate step in the forums and courts of the world to make known our national support of the Lithuanian people, our horror at their continued enslavement and our firm purpose to exercise all our influence to bring about the day when Lithuanian Independence Day will celebrate an actual fact instead of an historical one.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT].

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I am very privileged to join our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], in his tribute today. I think that he does us all a great service because he brings not only to mind the present condition of people who have not yet succeeded in getting out from under the Iron Curtain, but he reminds us of what might be our lot should the day ever come when we should fail to win our fight to sustain freedom in the world.

While we in the United States take part gladly in this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence day, it is with mixed feelings that we do so. There is sorrow for the plight of Lithuania today. There is sympathy and admiration for the long-continued struggle of right against might. There is joy in the thought of Lithuania's contributions to humanity—contributions through the ages and those of recent times and to us particularly in the United States.

Lithuania is a name ancient and apart as that of no other people except the Basques. Marked by the preservation of their language, these two peoples can claim antiquity such as that of no other group in Europe. The Lithuanian mark of individuality, of the continuity of personality, of distinction, has persevered through all the centuries of the Christian era. What other people can boast a linguistic heritage maintaining such pristine purity since the first mention of Lithuania by Tacitus?

Down through the centuries this heritage has been preserved although the country was tiny, the people few, and their history a tragic one. Buffeted between large and strong neighbors, Lithuania nevertheless maintained an independent force battling Russian tribes in the 11th century; attacked by Russians, Poles, and Germans in the 13th century; merging with Poland in the 14th to the 18th centuries. Under the Russian yoke from 1795 to 1915, Lithuania in World War I was again caught between two monster combatants—caught and ravaged, pillaged by first one side and then the other.

Yet Lithuania emerged triumphant. Lithuanian independence was declared. The declaration of February 16, 1918, is the independence we celebrate today. We rejoice together with a people whose courage and perseverance could persist through such age-old vicissitudes.

Today is a day to recall not only the valor and stamina of such people; but particularly to mark the culture which they have preserved from age to age. A religious people, the Lithuanians have maintained their piety and ideals through all generations of stress and disaster. For disaster was to be again their lot in World War II. Russia—the Soviet Union now—was again to seek to dominate this tiny but separate state. The United States has not recognized the results of this latest violence, politically. It deplores the suffering and hardships that persist for the Lithuanians at home. It honors the struggle that endures in the brave hearts and minds of these freedom-loving people.

We in the United States welcome in our midst the Lithuanians of today and yesterday. The Lithuanian-Americans have made many and distinct contributions to the progress of this country. The newcomers to the mining towns of Pennsylvania in the late 19th century were energetic and diversified in their pursuits. To many parts of our country the Lithuanians have come bringing with them devotion to ideals, hard work, and a sense of responsibility for each other as well as for themselves. We find Lithuanian farmers, journalists, tailors, writers, men of the cloth, musicians—in many pursuits and professions—often in closely knit groups, but always with aid for one another. Philanthropy has been typical of the Lithuanian-American. Also in the arts we find many interesting figures emerging from the Lithuanian born or those of Lithuanian parentage. Of particular interest to me are such names in music as Anna Kaskas and Polyna Stoska of Metropolitan Opera fame; Helen Mickunas of radio, opera, concert stage; Joseph Zilevicius, composer and former director of the Conservatory of Music in Klaipeda; Alexander Aleksis, former director of the Conservatory of Music in Warsaw; the stage designer and painter of water colors, Mstislav Dobujinsky; and Peretz Herbstein, author of "Green Pastures."

We welcome in our midst the personal contributions and distinctive racial characteristics of these people and their descendants. Of such is the New World built. The tremendous progress of our country has depended since colonial times on the influx of ethnic groups with individuality and with the hardihood and perseverance to hold their own through every contingency.

Psychological factors play a significant part in the building and maintenance of a society and in the promotion of its well-being. The independent spirit which marks the individuals who have battled against tyranny, who have maintained their freedom of thought and their ability to put it into action—this spirit is the very essence of Americanism. It is such a love of liberty and a perseverance in demanding it that we celebrate today—Lithuanian Independence Day.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, at the end of World War I the floodlight of freedom and independence swept over many parts of Europe. Numerous nationalities that were held down for centuries under the autocratic regimes and were often severely oppressed by their alien overlords in their homelands, cast off the heavy yoke of their oppressors and regained their freedom. All this happened during the last year of that war, in 1918. In central, eastern, and northeastern Europe close to one hundred million people who had lost their freedom in the past but who had been struggling for it, saw their most cherished dream come true in 1918. The Lithuanians were among these millions.

The Lithuanians have a distinct place in the turbulent and colorful history of northeastern Europe. They are the most numerous of the three Baltic nationalities, about 3 million in all, and they have always been sturdy defenders of liberty. Although they had borne the heavy yoke of the Russian czarist government for more than a century, they had successfully kept alive their love of liberty and their patriotism. Their tough and tenacious nature, and their unyielding spirit, fortified by their firm belief in Christian principles, served them well in their prolonged years of adversity. During that war they had suffered, but when the czarist regime was overthrown by the Russian Revolution, then they seized the opportunity and proclaimed their independence on February 16, 41 years ago.

Both in the attainment of their independence and in its maintenance during more than two decades, the United States, officially and unofficially, made considerable contribution. Struggling Lithuanians received great encouragement from the late President Wilson's historic fourteen points. To them it was a source of inspiration to know that their struggle for liberty and independence had the backing of our wartime President and our people. Of course, the large body of our loyal citizens of Lithuanian descent also played a signally important part.

This patriotic and law-abiding group, numbering more than 500,000 at the time, served the worthy Lithuanian cause just as fervently as they have served their adopted country. Through their own efforts and with aid of their friends abroad the war-torn Lithuania pulled itself out of existing chaos by its own boot straps. By 1920 Russian and German troops had been driven out, and, barring the unfortunate question of their capital city Vilna, Lithuanians settled their internal and external problems: they evolved a stable government and a balanced economy in agriculture, industry and trade. The Lithuanian Republic was recognized by the governments of other countries; it was admitted into the League of Nations and thus took its place in the international community. For about two decades the people worked hard and succeeded in making their historic country a prosperous and progressive democracy. They were happy and justly proud of their accomplishments.

Unfortunately this happy period lasted for only two decades. Early in 1939 storm clouds began to gather on the horizon; dictatorships of Hitler and Stalin seemed to be threatening independent Lithuania, but the latter was the deadlier of the two. At the beginning of the last war, Stalin felt free to act. He forced upon the helpless Lithuanians a "mutual assistance pact" early in 1940 whereby the country became partly occupied by Red army forces. Then in mid-June under the pretext that there were anti-Soviet forces in the country, Stalin moved in with the ostensible purpose of eliminating them, but actually he placed the country under military occupation. Under Russian guns, a Soviet style election was held; the emerging new pro-Soviet Government "requested" that Lithuania be incorporated into the Soviet Union. This was done on July 21, 1940.

Since that unhappy day the fate of Lithuania has been chained to totalitarian dictatorships. In the course of the last war, for about 2 years, Nazis occupied Lithuania and, of course, under such occupation Lithuanians suffered. Then toward the end of the war Soviet forces came back, took over the country, and since then they have been administering it as a Soviet colony. The once independent Lithuania, a real window between East and West, has been sealed up. It is impossible to learn much of the sad fate of unfortunate Lithuanians. For a long time the entire Baltic region was closed even to the select few who were privileged to visit the Soviet Union. Recently, however, some persons from the West were allowed to make limited and guided tours there, and their impressions are disheartening. There is no freedom of any kind. The people are restricted in their movements even within the country, and are watched over by Communists and Soviet agents. The authorities have done everything in their power to obliterate and wipe out all vestiges of the past. Nationalist and Christian ideals are proscribed, and those suspected of harboring such antirevolutionary ideas are arrested, sentenced, and severely punished. But even under such oppressed and inhumane conditions, Lithuanians have not lost hope of their eventual freedom. They have not forgotten their independence day, even though they are not permitted to celebrate it. We in the free world, and particularly in the United States, celebrate that event and thus echo their genuine sentiments. I am indeed glad to join Americans of Lithuanian descent on this day, in commemorating the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, and that their strong hope and permanent desire for the restoration to Lithuania of its independence and freedom will be quickly attained.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have perhaps a little different interest and a personal one in the cause that is being advocated today. I subscribe to it wholeheartedly. But a number of years ago a family came to my farm sponsored by the church that I attend. The story came to my attention of a family that fled from Lithuania with a horse and buggy and in it were the meager belongings of this family and their three children. They eventually fled to Germany and were there five years, and then came to America as a displaced family. The pastor of my church came to me and asked me if I would take them out to my farm and give them a place to live until they became adjusted to this country. So here came Jonas and Marie Dumpys, the father and mother, and their children Martin, Hans, and Ruth.

They established themselves well and learned to speak the American language. They went on to school. All of them got a job. Today they own a home in Hutchinson. They own an automobile. The daughter is a graduate nurse. The son is studying for the ministry, and the youngest boy, Martin, is in the Air Force.

Seeing the quality and the industry of this family can only emphasize the tremendous opportunity that must be ours to help that little country become liberated again. I join with all of the gentlemen in the hope that their endeavors and their objectives may be gained.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOSMER].

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, today, February 16, 1959, the Lithuanians celebrate the 41st anniversary of their declaration of independence. This, their independence day, recalls the day in 1918 when, at the end of World War I, freedom again was restored to this troubled land. This independence and freedom did not come easily. It came through struggle, hardship, and bloodshed. It came much in the way that the people of our own Thirteen Colonies fought for and won freedom and independence.

For more than 20 years Lithuania grew in stature. Major progress was made in agriculture and industry. Improvements in transportation and education, great strides in land reform and social legislation, and remarkable gains in material and spiritual well-being were products of these golden years of independence. I had the privilege of visiting this land during those years.

But this hard-fought freedom came to an end in March 1939. Today Lithuania is an enslaved nation ruled by a puppet government. Her people are scattered throughout slave-labor camps of Europe and the wastes of Siberia. One-fourth of her population has died at the hands of her Soviet oppressors.

No one who is familiar with the dark chapter of Soviet exploitation in the 20th century need be told what the ironshod heels of the Red army brought to that fair and happy land whose people had learned the joys of freedom.

It is indeed sad to reflect upon the fact that today, the independence day of Lithuania, it is only outside, in the free world—in countries to which Lithuanians have brought their great cultural heritage—that the anniversary of her independence can be celebrated. Only in the free world can Lithuanians speak for their countrymen, living in the silenced homeland, of their unceasing struggle for independence and freedom.

Let us, therefore, on the 41st anniversary of the independence of Lithuania join with our Lithuanian friends everywhere in reasserting our firm opposition to Soviet aggression. Let us tell the one million Americans of Lithuanian descent that we stand shoulder to shoulder with them in our prayers and work for their countrymen. Let us pledge never to forget our obligations to the people of Lithuania and other captive nations who have known for so many years the grinding heel of oppression, but who, through it all, have not succumbed to the doctrines of their oppressor but have rallied their strength and courage to meet the overwhelming obstacles. Why can they face their oppression with courage? Because the divine spark burns in each Lithuanian heart, and their desire for and love of the freedom that we know—and they tasted—drives them on.

We today, in commemorating that glorious day 41 years ago when Lithuania declared her independence, hope to kindle anew the hope of our Lithuanian friends and encourage their every effort to stand stalwart in their dark days of oppression and look forward to the day that Soviet oppression can no longer separate them from freedom.

To the 20,000 Americans of Lithuanian descent living in my own State of California, I wish to send words of hope that the brutal yoke of the oppressors may soon be lifted from the shoulders of their countrymen and that the freedoms we love and cherish may again settle as a protective blanket over that courageous country of Lithuania so her people's dreams of independence may again become a reality.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I had the high honor and the great privilege last year in Philadelphia at the national convention of the Knights of Lithuania of receiving from that distinguished organization the gold medal for distinguished service for that society and for that country and that people. This coming Sunday, in the same city of Philadelphia, I will be privileged to address the anual exercises joining in commemoration of this ceremony today, and I shall be happy to convey to that meeting the spirit of this meeting in this assembly.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I am honored today to have the privilege of joining with the people of Lithuania in commemorating the 41st anniversary of their independence. Freedom-loving people everywhere will join with the Americans of Lithuanian birth and descent in New York and throughout the world in observing this day as Lithuanian Independence Day.

Although the brave nation of Lithuania only dated its modern independence from February 16, 1918, the date we are commemorating today, the people of Lithuania have a long and glorious history behind them. Their traditions, their language, their culture, and their constant desire for freedom are reasons why the foreign occupation of their homeland since 1940 has not been able to dampen the spirit of independence in their hearts.

This anniversary should be a constant reminder to all the free peoples of the world of the treachery and evilness practiced by the Soviet tyrants. It should instill in all of us a renewed determination to protect our liberties and should imbue us with the will to fulfill our obligations toward the defenseless people behind the Iron Curtain.

I extend my best wishes to the gallant Lithuanian patriots and feel confident that the great spirit which helped sustain Lithuania through other periods of moral and physical slavery will sustain them once again. I fervently pray that their freedom is near at hand and that their nation will enjoy complete restoration of independence.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, today Lithuanians in the free world will gather together to observe the 41st anniversary of the independence of their country. For although their country is under the heel of Red oppression, the idea of a free and independent Lithuania is as strong today as it was in 1918 when the Republic was first declared.

It is especially fitting that the American people pause to pay tribute to a gallant people who have contributed so freely of themselves in the building of this great Nation. They have given their indomitable spirit, their labor, and their lives in the furtherance of our democratic way of life. There are in this country today nearly 1 million citizens of Lithuanian origin. They have left a proud record in every aspect of the American way of life.

But our bond with the people of Lithuania goes beyond this. It is the common bond that holds free men everywhere together. The Lithuanians have shared and worked for the same tradition of liberty and independence as we have. Theirs has been a hard and bitter struggle to maintain this Western tradition. For centuries the Russians have tried to eradicate all traces of democracy and nationalism in Lithuania, but without success. They have banned the language, the religion, the literature. They have resorted to mass murder and deportation. Always they have met with failure.

It is, therefore, for us, the free, to affirm our faith and our hope in the future destiny of the Lithuanian people. The flame of liberty burns brightly in the hearts of Lithuanians. Our task is to continue to enkindle this flame in their hearts until the day of final liberation.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, recent and current international events have caused misery and misfortune to many peoples; some have suffered and are still suffering under tyranny. Their lot has been truly tragic. That has been true with the Lithuanian people.

These brave and courageous people who had regained their independence in the First World War, were not allowed to enjoy their richly deserved freedom very long. After regaining it in 1918, upon proclaiming the Lithuanian Republic on February 16 of that year, they lived in joy and worked ceaselessly and happily in making their small and devastated country a happy home for all Lithuanians. For more than 20 years they made the most of their freedom and were perfectly content with their democratic way of life. But the outbreak of the Second World War ushered in sad days for them. They were robbed of their independence by Communist Russians; the country was made part of the Soviet Union, and they were forced to submit to the unbending and stern rule of the Kremlin.

That is the unhappy and unenviable lot of some 3 million Lithuanians today in their homeland. There they work for their taskmasters and pray for their deliverance from Moscow's tyranny.

In observing the 41st anniversary of their independence day, we pay tribute to their steadfastness and courage, and hope that soon they will be free to enjoy the fruits of their labor in their homeland.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join in paying tribute to the brave people of the Republic of Lithuania, whose freedom was first proclaimed 41 years ago today. On that date, the courageous people of Lithuania had finally climaxed a long struggle for freedom by achieving genuine independence.

But, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the people of Lithuania are no longer free, because since 1940 this brave small country on the Baltic has been a Soviet concentration camp and its people the victims of ruthless Communist domination. The iron chain of Communist tyranny keeps Lithuania in a state of constant terror and exploitation by her Kremlin masters.

Today, when Lithuania cannot speak for herself, it is a privilege to speak for that country of indomitable courage and undying devotion to freedom. The people of Lithuania are dedicated to the principles of individual liberty and national independence, and they have maintained their national identity in spite of their long term of enslavement.

The history of the noble Lithuanian people shows unmistakably that freedom is part of the Lithuanian character. Since the 13th century Lithuania has enjoyed independence and self-government only at intervals between invasions by the Russians and Teutons in their mad rush for conquest and European domination. After more than 100 years of struggling against czarist Russian subjugation, Lithuania became a republic and proudly took its place among the democratic nations of the world. Unfortunately her independence was short lived; after 22 years of freedom and progress, Lithuania was seized again by Soviet Russia in 1940.

The people of Lithuania remain a captive nation of Soviet Russia, subjugated and enslaved under Communist tyranny. They have paid a great toll in human suffering; yet they have never given up their hopes for national liberation. Behind the Iron Curtain they are sealed off from any contact with the rest of the world. But they are not forgotten by freedom-loving men. This anniversary of independence fought for, earned, cherished, but lost, continues to be observed in the hearts of the people of Lithuania as well as in the hearts of all who love freedom everywhere. The Soviet masters can capture their bodies, but not their minds and souls. There is no Lithuanian flag in Lithuania, no national anthem—but these symbols of a liberated Lithuania still burn brightly in their hearts.

Meanwhile, this observance here and throughout other lands where people of Lithuanian blood are living today will be heard behind the Iron Curtain. It will demonstrate that the plight of Lithuania is not forgotten, and that we join with them and with Lithuanians everywhere in prayer that the day of freedom for these brave and valiant people shall not be far away. It will demonstrate to the Communist jailors and to the world that we in America recognize that freedom is indivisible and that not until the day when the people of Lithuania are genuinely free can we in America fully enjoy and appreciate our own freedom.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am happy today to join with all Americans of Lithuanian descent in paying tribute on the 41st anniversary of the birth of Lithuania as a free and sovereign nation of the world. I am certain that I am joined in these sentiments not only by all lovers of freedom in the United States but by all throughout the civilized world who respect honesty, integrity and the rights of all peoples to self-government.

It is a tragic fact that the independence of Lithuania was a short-lived one for not too long after the infamous Nazi-Soviet pact, Lithuania fell before the red scourge of communism.

None the less, Lithuania still is alive today. The U.S. Government to its everlasting credit has steadfastly refused to recognize the rape of the Lithuanian Republic by the Soviet Union. Thus, for the record, Lithuania lives on awaiting a new birth of freedom.

As I stated at the outset, I believe it is only proper and fitting for us to pay homage to the suppressed people who have struggled on so valiantly against the worst form of tyranny. It is true that the more than 3 million Lithuanians in their homeland today may not hear us directly but I am sure they are with us in spirit. Further I am certain that some day the tragic ordeal of this gallant country will come to an end and that an independent and sovereign Republic of Lithuania will once again be able to take its rightful place among the free nations of the world.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, Lithuania is a small country in northeastern Europe, and the Lithuanian people constitute one of the smaller ethnic groups in that part of the world, but there they have played an exceptionally important role. The state they founded some 700 years ago endured for centuries, and at one time was a real force in East European affairs. Early in modern times the Lithuanian Kingdom was united with that of Poland, and from then on the fate of both peoples were wedded. Finally, late in the 18th century, when Poland was partitioned and ceased to be an independent state, Lithuania also suffered a similar fate and became a Russian Province.

From then on, for more than 100 years, Lithuanians lived under the autocratic and oppressive czarist regime, but they clung to their national traditions with stubborn tenacity and held fast to certain high ideals, such as freedom, liberty, and independence; and when they had the chance to realize these ideals, they seized upon it and proclaimed their independence. This was done on February 16, 1918, and Lithuania became a republic. At that time the war was still raging and most of the country was under enemy occupation. Soon, however, the war ended and all Lithuanians joined hands not only in the fullness of joy to celebrate their victory, but also for the rebuilding of their now liberated country. In this task they were astonishingly successful. In a few years Lithuania was blessed with prosperity and progress. For more than two decades they lived in happiness and freedom. But then came the rude shock caused by the Second World War. Early in that war Russian Communists robbed Lithuania of its freedom and made the country part of the Soviet Union.

Since then, for more than 18 years, Lithuanians have been suffering under the worst of totalitarian dictatorships. Commissars and spy rings, paid and unpaid agents of the Communists, and planted informers and cruel executioners have literally changed the life in Lithuania to one of regimented horror. But even under such horrors and terrors, the unhappy but stouthearted Lithuanian has not given up hope for his eventual freedom. On this 41st anniversary celebration of Lithuanian Independence Day we all hope and pray that his wish will come true and that he will be rewarded with freedom and independence in his beloved Lithuania.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today, on the 41st anniversary of the event, there cannot be any independence day celebrations in Lithuania. It is for those of us in the free world who remember Lithuania's freedom, and who hope for its resurrection, to mark this day of independence. We do so without hopelessness, for the spirit of Lithuanian nationalism has been able to survive Russian oppression once before.

The Lithuanians came under Tsarist control at about the same time the United States Constitution was ratified. In the ensuing years, while Americans have known only freedom, the proud people of Lithuania have known only terror and suppression. The Tsars of Russia even abolished the name of Lithuania. They smashed all forms of local autonomy, suppressed the use of the Lithuanian language, and did all in their power to remove any trace or memory of Lithuania's proud heritage.

They failed, for as the old Russian regime fell, and Lithuania came under German occupation during the First World War, the patriots of Lithuania declared their country's independence, on the 16th of February 1918. It was a time of great events all over Europe, and nationalities which had been held down for centuries under the old regimes now tasted once again their new freedom. All these peoples, like the Lithuanians, were fired by the ideals of President Wilson's 14 points, and they proceeded to establish democratic governments. Independent Lithuania was soon recognized by the great powers, and in 1921 the long oppressed people had new reason for pride when their government became a member of the League of Nations.

For more than 20 years, throughout the interwar period, this intelligent and industrious people made remarkable progress toward establishing stability. They achieved a balanced economy in trade, industry, and farming. From the ruins of war great strides were made in establishing a prosperous, progressive democracy. This happy period, in which so many of the aspirations of Lithuanian nationalism were finally reaching fruition, was doomed to end as the fear of war began to engulf all Europe. There was increasing diplomatic pressure from the Soviet Union, and eventually, as a war broke out, the unfortunate Lithuanians had to allow the Red army into the country. Finally, under threats of death and imprisonment for all who refused to accede, Lithuanians had to join the Soviet Union—another victim.

Thus Lithuanian independence came to an end, but free peoples were not fooled by this heavyhanded act of Soviet despotism. The United States and Great Britain knew that the incorporation of Lithuania into the Red bloc was against the wishes of the Lithuanian people, and they refused to recognize the Communist regime.

Since that unhappy day, however, Lithuania's fate has been determined by the acts of totalitarian dictators. Not very long after the Russians moved into Lithuania, the Nazis ousted the Soviets and took over themselves. The result was 3 years of the most sickening and heartbreaking oppression, terror and fear. Under the Nazis, hundreds of thousands of Lithuanians were slaughtered, others were pressed into a war in which they had no concern, and thousands more were made to do slave labor.

Toward the end of the Second World War the Red forces returned, and reestablished their control over Lithuania. As we might expect, it meant a continuation of slavery. The Russians, now adding the venom of their Marxist ideology, have been determined to stamp out all vestiges of Lithuania's past. Religion and nationalism are suppressed and all opposition is cruelly punished. But we in the free world know that the Lithuanians have not forgotten the past—we know that no amount of dictatorship and terror can obliterate the spiritual freedom of a people.

One of the basic reasons why we look with confidence to the future knowing that Lithuania will some day again be a free democratic country is that in its resistance to this Communist oppression it has on its side its greatest national virtue, that of intense devotion to Christianity. The Lithuanian nation is predominately Roman Catholic in faith with other Christian sects also a vital part of the Lithuanian national life. This intense traditional devotion to Christianity gives the Lithuanian people the necessary inner strength to survive against the materialistic onslaught of its atheistic communistic oppressor. For that reason we join all Lithuanians, and especially Americans of Lithuanian descent, in remembering this day, the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, the staunchest and stoutest champions of freedom and independence in Europe are to be found among the northeast Europeans. They all have learned to fight in adversity and often against fearful odds, but they have fought bravely even in a losing battle. The Lithuanians are such a people. Throughout their modern history they have fought hard and fought courageously for high ideals against the forces of oppression, and tyranny. As a matter of fact, most of their modern history may be written in terms of unending struggles against their oppressors. For centuries they fought against Russia's autocracy. Their unyielding and uncompromising spirit, their firm resolve to cling to certain high ideals, and their firm belief in basic principles of Christian civilization have served them well in times of distress and despondency. During all that time they awaited for the chance to free themselves, and in 1918 that chance was theirs.

On February 16 of that year, even before the end of the First World War, they proclaimed their national political independence, and in their historic homeland they established a working democratic government. That government lasted for more than two decades, and during that time the people enjoyed the blessings of freedom. Unfortunately, soon after the outbreak of the last war the Lithuanians once more found themselves in a desperate situation. Then their independence became one of the first casualties of the war. In July of 1940 the country was occupied by the Red army and annexed to the Soviet Union. Since then Lithuanians have been denied personal and national freedom in their historic homeland.

Today millions of innocent, helpless, and patriotic Lithuanians are not permitted to celebrate the Lithuanian Independence Day in their homeland, or even to talk or write about it. There they suffer under the totalitarian Communist dictatorship imposed upon them by the rulers in the Kremlin. They live in dread of the secret police, of imminent arrest, imprisonment, and often in fear of being shipped off to some distant and desolate part of the Soviet Union. On this memorable day, in commemorating Lithuanian Independence Day, I gladly join Americans of Lithuanian descent and pray for the deliverance of their unfortunate kinsmen from Communist oppression and tyranny.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, today we stand once more in proud commemoration of the 41st anniversary of the restoration of Lithuanian independence. We again bear witness to the eternal truth that all men are endowed with the right to individual and national freedom. Again we declare our own faith that no individual in any land has the right to deprive his fellow man of human liberty.

It was over 700 years ago that the independent state of Lithuania came into being. In the long history of this indomitable people, the struggle for freedom and independence has never ceased—even against the Russians who succeeded in extending their domination over Lithuania for more than a century.

The free spirit of Lithuania rose again in 1918 when full independence was again proclaimed—and as do free men everywhere, the people set themselves successfully to the task of rebuilding the nation and developing her industry, commerce, agriculture, science, and education. Their success did more than contribute to their national well-being: it was an outward and visible sign of their strong devotion to the cause of freedom and human rights, as they demonstrated that only under freedom can be obtained the highest level of prosperity and human development. That spirit still glows, despite the present incorporation of their land into the U.S.S.R. under conditions which deny basic human rights.

The Lithuanian cause, therefore, is of deep concern to all freedom-loving people. Again I reiterate, so long as one nation or even one man is deprived of liberty, the liberty of all men is indeed in jeopardy. The peace of our world, for which we all long and pray, depends upon the preservation of human rights, for man, born to be free, will not willingly or long wear the yoke of domination.

So today we join with all Lithuanians everywhere in celebrating the restoration of their independence and rededicating ourselves with them to the cherished cause of freedom. Sadly we realize the tragedy inherent in the fact that

Lithuanian people behind the Iron Curtain cannot themselves openly commemorate this traditional occasion. We are sure, however, that the instinct for freedom, the memory of freedom lives in their hearts and that their faith in the eventual deliverance of their nation will never weaken. We pray with them that that day of freedom will soon come.

And in so praying, we are joined today by all Americans of Lithuanian descent, whose spirit of independence and love of freedom have so enriched our own national life. Their dedication to the cause of independence for their motherland—and their equal dedication to the cause of freedom and justice for all men—continually rekindles in this country our own clear flame of independence. We are grateful for them, as we stand together in witness to the right of all men to walk in freedom and human dignity.

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, once again it is not only my privilege but the privilege of many of us elected representatives of our great Nation to pay homage and tribute to the brave people of Lithuania, lovers of liberty, who have suffered so much and have displayed their intense dedication to the just cause of free people. It is especially appropriate at this time while we Members of the Congress are endeavoring to reach great decisions which have to do with freedom in the world and the establishment of a lasting peace, that we pause for a moment to honor this small but valiant nation. When we remember Lithuania we are reminded of what has happened to the people of Hungary, of the enslavement of Poland, of the ruthless demands of communism over the people of Germany, of the tragedy of Rumania, and the enslavement of China. All this is emphasized by the recent visit to our shores of that mastermind of intrigue and deceit, that ruthless and civil champion of communism, Anastas Mikoyan.

We hear little or nothing about Lithuania these days. This nation is suppressed by Communist Russia, cloistered behind an Iron Curtain that is never raised, where visitors are not permitted to enter and natives rarely allowed to depart. This policy is shamelessly and cruelly adhered to by the Communists in spite of the assurances which are given almost daily that visitors to Russia may go anywhere and see for themselves what communism is doing for the Russian people. What little is known about the economic situation in this valiant country indicates that poverty and a reign of terror with political executions are the order of the day, and that planned starvation and exile of the natives to death camps in various parts of the Russian empire are ruthlessly carried on. The Russians may claim to be ahead of the world in the development of nuclear science but, although they do not claim it, there can be no dispute about their leadership in bringing sorrow, devastation, and distress to the innocent people whom they conquer by force and might. In the face of such conditions the indescribable courage of countries like Lithuania is insurance that the ideology of Communism will never survive because no freeminded people will ever forget the bestial brutality and faithlessness of the leaders of the Russian people. The indomitable will of these wonderful people of Lithuania shines as a beacon for truth, honesty, courage, and liberty in the world.

It is right for us to be proud of the attitude that our country has taken toward the Lithuanian Republic. We have refused to recognize the Russian domination and its forceful absorption of this gallant nation. We continue to recognize its diplomatic and consular representatives in the United States and by so doing we honor our own heritage and keep alive in the hearts of the tortured people throughout the world the love of liberty and the hope and faith in the righteousness of things. It is unthinkable that we should ever fail the Lithuanians for we cannot be false to our own ideals, but let us take courage and strength, and be fortified by the example set by this nation in its love of liberty. The United States must continue and strengthen our dedication to the cause of justice and freedom, and by our good will and interest in the welfare of these stricken people we may keep alive the fire of hope and the determination that the dawn of a better day will come to pass.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence commemorating the end of over a century of oppression is an occasion for sorrow as well as joy. Tyranny under Soviet Communist rule has again enveloped Lithuania and temporarily destroyed her hard-won freedom which was realized on February 16, 1918, when she proclaimed her national independence.

I would like to join with the nearly 1 million Americans of Lithuanian descent who are pausing to commemorate this event in expressing hope and prayers for the emergence of a free Lithuania soon. We in America can help by keeping the story of the tragedy of Lithuania before the other nations of the world. We can show that we will remain resolute in our fight against Communist aggression. America's continued refusal to recognize the annexation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union and our constant condemnation of the enslavement of free peoples of the world by force are means by which we can help the freedom-loving people of Lithuania.

Past history has shown that the Lithuanian people have the ability to withstand a great deal of tyranny. Not even the Russians' planned program of genocide can eliminate the love of liberty and the dreams of independence of the Lithuanian patriots.

Let us never forget our obligations to the people of Lithuania and other captive nations so that their day of delivery from under the heel of their cruel oppressors may be speeded.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, freedom and independence are the most cherished aims of individuals and nations, and their attainment, both by individuals and nations, have always been regarded as the successful culmination of their struggle toward those supreme goals. In the case of nations when these dreams come true, when these rewarding tasks are successfully accomplished, and when those who have carried on the fight, regain their liberty and freedom, and independence, then all hardships and tribulations, all sacrifices and sufferings, are forgotten, and the memorable occasion becomes enshrined in national annals as a national holiday. And if the nation is fortunate and powerful enough to safeguard and maintain this supreme prize, then its anniversary is observed with due solemnity. In some cases these annual events sometimes become perfunctory, and their celebration becomes somewhat routine. This is partly because the people take their freedom and independence for granted, think of liberty and independence as their birthrights, and as such their inalienable possessions, never to be subjected to debate or dispute. Happy the nation that finds itself in such an enviable situation for any length of time, especially in these perilous times. But the observance of independence day anniversaries has another meaning and bears another message to those less fortunate peoples and nations, who, having regained their independence after a long and arduous struggle carried on against heavy odds, often formidable odds, and having sacrificed nearly all their worldly possessions and many of their dear ones, find themselves once more without liberty and independence, without the freedom which they had regarded as the spiritual sinews of their life. The tragedy of the Lithuanian people is of this kind.

These hardy and hardworking, brave and courageous people, have been living in their historic homeland on the eastern shores of the Baltic Sea from times immemorial. There they had founded their independent state and had become a sovereign nation centuries before Columbus discovered America. Though at no time in their long history were they more than a few millions, their important part in the history of Eastern Europe bears no relation to their present small size as a nation. For a long time they formed a powerful empire extending far to the south into the Ukraine and beyond, and there became a veritable force against the Asiatic hordes invading Europe. Then early in modern times the Lithuanian Kingdom was united with that of Poland, forming a dual monarchy. And in the late 18th century, when Poland was partitioned and a good part of it fell to Russia, Lithuania also became a province of the czarist empire. Thus had come to an end the glorious days of Lithuanian history; thenceforth they were to endure the oppressive yoke of the czars and suffer in the hands of their callous and cruel agents.

For nearly 150 years until the First World War, they lived in their homeland as subjects of the czars without losing their Lithuanian nationality, and their fine national traits. They also clung tenaciously and with uncommon determination to some of their most cherished national ideals: freedom, liberty, independence. Throughout this long period they strove hard to keep alive these ideals and Lithuanian national traditions. Often they had to resort to underground and clandestine methods to succeed in their efforts; when detected and caught in these "treasonable" acts, they gladly suffered the consequences in prisons and exile, not infrequently sacrificing their very lives. Still they persisted in their struggle against powerful forces under all kinds of handicaps, and instead of submitting and yielding, they doubled and redoubled their efforts in the firm belief that they were entitled to freedom and independence. Then the day of reckoning came to the czarist regime in Russia; in 1917 revolutionary forces overthrew the despotic remnant of medieval days. When it was shattered beyond repair, the peoples who were held in chains by that autocratic regime felt free to regain their liberty and proclaim their independence. The Lithuanians were one of these peoples.

On February 16, 1918, 41 years ago, they proclaimed their national independence in their historic homeland and instituted their own democratic republic. That was a joyful day for the Lithuanians and also to their friends and sympathizers everywhere. We in particular in this country were delighted. Not only so many of our loyal Americans of Lithuanian descent had a share in the making of new Lithuania, but the Lithuanian people were encouraged and inspired by our former President Wilson. Thus, freed from the deadly hand which held them down for so long, and aided both spiritually and materially by their friends, the Lithuanians rolled up their sleeves and got down to work. In the course of a bare two decades, during the relatively short interwar period allotted to them, they worked hard, ceaselessly, and accomplished near miracles. The war-ravaged country was rebuilt; the democratic regime took firm roots, and in nearly all aspects of their lives Lithuanians made tremendous advances; they prospered and progressed. Everyone thrived through their industry and hard work, and everyone was happy. Then approached another event over which they had no control. As the clouds of the Second World War were darkening the horizon, they became apprehensive; they began to worry about their independence, and even for their safety. Unfortunately, their worst fears and forebodings came true. Early in the course of that war, when Lithuania's friends in the West were in a life-and-death struggle, Stalin's forces treacherously invaded the country, occupied it, and hundreds of thousands of Lithuanians were arrested and shipped to distant and desolate corners of the Soviet Union and those left behind in the country were to submit to the stern rule of Communist dictatorship of the Kremlin. In July of 1940 Lithuania was annexed to the Soviet Union and thus came to an end the Lithuanian Republic that was born on February 16, 1918.

During the last war Lithuanians suffered much and sacrificed nearly all their worldly possessions. Though theoretically not a combatant nation in that war, yet they lost more than many nations who as such fought in that war. For a time they came under the Nazi regime, and their lot was hardly any better under Hitler's underlings. Toward the end of the war when the Red Army reentered Lithuania, Communists returned in greater force and with greater fury. They set out to eradicate all traces of nationalism and freedom in the country. All personal possessions were confiscated by the state; and everything is owned by the state and operated for the state. All citizens in this totalitarian setup are mere cogs in the big state machine. Every phase of their daily life is rigidly regulated by the state. Regimentation is carried to its absurd limits, far beyond what one finds even in the armed forces in democracies of the West. No freedom or liberty is allowed to the people. The country is sealed off from the free world. No movement is permitted in and out of the country, and of course visitors from the free world are absolutely forbidden to enter, except under most rigid and supervised guidance.

Such being the almost unprecedented and unfortunate situation, we in the free world do not exactly know what happens there. We rarely hear of the unenviable lot of these unhappy and helpless Lithuanians, and that little is discouraging, almost despairing. All is black in that land of misfortune under Communist totalitarian dictatorship. All Lithuanians live there as prisoners in a large prison camp, fated to work as slaves for the all-powerful and heartless Communist state. The one encouraging and hopeful sign in this array of darkness and sadness is that these liberty-loving and stouthearted people still cherish their love for freedom; they still yearn for independence, and they are prepared to make the ultimate sacrifice for the attainment of these supreme goals. On the observance of the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, we in the free world, in this great habitat of democracy and the home of the free, can do no less, and unfortunately at this time no more, than to echo their genuine sentiment on this memorable occasion.

As I have said in the past, and shall repeat it again, these valiant Lithuanians have never forgotten the sweet taste of freedom. Despite the torture and oppression the Lithuanian people suffer today, we know that their love for liberty is not dimmed and that they have never given up the fight to regain the freedom that was once theirs. Their inhuman oppressors may prevent the Lithuanians from exercising their natural right of freedom, but they cannot force these brave people to accept and believe in the tyranny imposed upon them. The people of Lithuania must know that their countrymen throughout the world, and we in the United States, have not forgotten their plight. In marking this day once more we do not merely recall the dead past. But rather, we reaffirm our faith in this brave country's devotion to liberty and independence and express the hope that the day may soon come when Lithuanians once more may breathe the air of freedom in their beloved and historic homeland.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, nations, like individuals, do not live by bread alone; ideas and ideals often form an important, and sometimes a crucial part of their fare. Freedom and independence, the liberty to work and enjoy the fruits of one's labor, are perhaps the noblest and ripest of human desires. And national independence is one of the conditions under which individual and group freedom may be attained, for it is almost impossible to conceive of freedom in a land where the people are subjected to the stern regime of alien and unwanted overlords.

Late in the 18th century when the Lithuanians lost their national independence and were brought under the czarist regime of Russia, they lost much of their individual freedoms. For almost a century and a half the stalwart and stouthearted Lithuanians suffered under the brutalities of czarist cruel agents. During that unhappy period they did not lose sight of their objective: the attainment of their independence. In 1918, when that detested regime was overthrown, Lithuanians proclaimed their independence on February 16. That day marks a great turning point in their national history, for from then on a new day had dawned for them. The next two decades were to become a kind of golden age in modern Lithuania. The Lithuanians were justly proud of their splendid record of performance during those two peaceful decades in every walk of their national life. Unfortunately, however, that happy interlude was not to last long. The Second World War was a national tragedy for the Lithuanians. They were one of the first victims of that war as Russian armies moved westward to the Baltic Sea. During that war they suffered much and lost nearly all their worldly possessions, but they still had the hope of regaining their freedom after that war. In that expectation they, as well as their friends, were sadly disappointed. Even before the end of that war the Red army made sure that Lithuania would remain a part of the Soviet Union.

Since 1945 Lithuania has become a large prison camp for its liberty-loving but helpless inhabitants. The country is completely sealed off from the world outside; no one is allowed to leave it, and no one from the free world is allowed to enter it, except the very few who have proved their longstanding sympathy for the Soviet Union and Communist cause. We hear that Lithuanians have been exiled to other parts of the Soviet Union by the tens of thousands, and their place is taken by peoples brought there from Asiatic areas of the Union. All Lithuanians living on the seashore and on border areas have been moved to the interior and have been forced to work in collectivized farms. Of course, they have lost their possessions, and all are in the employ of the state, since the state owns and runs everything in that part of Communist paradise. It is unthinkable to have any freedom under such a system—freedom of speech, of assembly, and of movement is rigidly controlled. The activities of individuals and groups are closely watched, and everyone lives in fear of arrest and imprisonment. Under these conditions, helpless Lithuanians work for their taskmasters and quietly pray for their deliverance from Communist tyranny. Today, on this anniversary celebration, I gladly join hands with all loyal Americans of Lithuanian descent and express my heartfelt wish to see their freedom.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, Lithuanians all over the world are marking this day as an anniversary of their independence. As we all are well aware, the observance is ironically symbolic. Since 1944 Lithuania has been in the grip of Soviet domination. We in the United States have never recognized the demise of the legitimate Lithuanian Government, and, we hope that by doing so the enslaved Lithuanian people know that Americans feel and understand their plight. With each passing day we understand more the threat of Soviet despotism. The love of freedom and the will to resist oppression never die in the hearts of men. No people have demonstrated this fact more effectively than the Lithuanians. It is for this reason that I feel honored to join my fellow Americans in commemoration of the brave spirit and hopes of the Lithuanian people on this 41st anniversary of their independence.

Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on this anniversary date in the history of Lithuania, we in America express anew our hopes and prayers for the return of her independence. We join with our Lithuanian friends in commemorating that day 41 years ago when the brave people in their homeland briefly won victory in their long struggle for liberty. Today, Communist tyranny casts its dark and ugly shadow over that small country, but through this darkness glows the light of freedom which is nurtured and so cherished in the hearts of these valiant people. By our words and work for freedom throughout the world, we will continue to give them hope and courage until once again they shall be free and independent.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, today the people of Lithuania observe the 41st anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of the Republic of Lithuania on February 16, 1918.

There can, of course, be no public celebration of this event within Lithuania which is now under the cruel domination of Soviet Russia. But the love of freedom is a flame within the hearts of the Lithuanian people, and it will continue to burn bright until the day of Lithuanian liberation arrives.

In the United States of America we believe that freedom is everybody's business, and we feel a deep and personal concern for all people who are held in bondage by Communist tyranny.

On this anniversary of Lithuania's declaration of independence, the American people join with the people of Lithuania and those of Lithuanian ancestry in fervent prayer that the Russian yoke will be thrown off, and that the brave and courageous people of Lithuania may soon receive the blessings of freedom and personal liberty.

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, another year has rolled around and again we, here in the Congress, are privileged to offer our good wishes to Lithuania and Lithuanians on the occasion of her 41st anniversary of independence.

To a nation which has stood for so long with patience, perseverance and courage, the pain of oppression, it seems so very little that we here in the United States can only by words commemorate this significant occasion.

With my prayers and good wishes goes the hope that Lithuania on her next anniversary will enjoy with us the incomparable blessings of freedom.

Mr. KLUCZYNSKI. Mr. Speaker, February 16 is the independence day of Lithuania. This year, however, on the 41st anniversary of the proclamation of its independence, Lithuania no longer enjoys her freedom. On the eve of World War II she became the victim of Soviet conspiracy and aggression.

The dream of Xerxes to "extend the Persian territory as far as God's heaven reaches," where "the sun will then shine on no land beyond our borders," has been revived by the Communist leaders in the 20th century. World revolution, the world domination, have always fascinated them. Convinced that World War II would bring victory for the Communist revolution, the Soviet Union opened the gates of aggression in Europe by becoming a party to the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, signed on August 23, 1939. By the terms of this pact, the Soviet Union and Germany divided Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union receiving eastern Poland, Latvia, and Estonia, and later, through an additional secret protocol signed on September 23, 1939, bringing Lithuania into her sphere of influence. All that happened later—the forced conclusion of mutual assistance pacts between the Soviet Union and the Baltic States, military occupation, formation of puppet governments, mock elections—all this was nothing but a history of enslavement for Lithuania and the other Baltic States, notwithstanding the most solemn pledges on the part of the Soviets to respect their territorial integrity and political independence and to abstain from any act of aggression—"No political, military, economic, or other consideration may serve as an excuse or justification for aggression"—treaty on the definition of aggression of July 23, 1933.

As we have seen, the occupation and incorporation of Lithuania and the other Baltic States in 1940 was only a prelude to further territorial acquisitions in Europe and Asia. In Europe alone some hundred million people, citizens of formerly independent nations, were compelled to accept the Soviet rule and forced to work for the strengthening of the Soviet Union.

The same striving for world domination and expansion was expressed by Khrushchev at the 20th Communist Party Congress:

> The Communist Party of the Soviet Union follows Lenin's thesis that "all nations will realize socialism, this is inevitable, but not all of them in the same way."

And Khrushchev added:

> These [the bourgeois or capitalist] politicians do not dare to declare that capitalism will perish in the new world war, if they wage it, but they are already forced to admit that the Socialist camp is invincible.

Soviet expansion in Europe and Asia was carried out with the greatest ruthlessness, and has been accompanied by the most appalling misery:

> In the Soviet sector of the world from the Elbe to China, the pattern of people's democracy brought the blessing of suppression of freedom of opinion, secret police, torture, miscarriage of justice, deportation, and forced labor camps to millions of hungry and war-weary people (Georg Schwarzenberger, "Power Politics," New York, Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1951, pp. 633–634).

Although this picture is well known to all students of Soviet policy, nevertheless it seems well to remind everyone of these events, and on this occasion in particular, of the fate of Lithuania, especially now that the Soviet Union is engaged in a feverish campaign for, among other things, peaceful coexistence.

After the incorporation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union, the Soviets tried to justify this action on several grounds. They advanced the thesis that the Soviet Union was forced to issue ultimatums to the Baltic countries because these countries did not observe the conditions of peaceful coexistence. In the pamphlet "The Soviet Union, Finland and the Baltic States," published by Soviet War News on behalf of the Soviet Information Bureau, in 1941, this thesis was stated as follows:

> The Soviet Government considered that the Baltic States were in duty bound to fulfill only one condition necessary for peaceful coexistence. This condition was loyalty and readiness (and this not only in words but in deeds) on the part of the Baltic States not to violate the security of the Soviet Union, not to transform their territory into places d'armes for possible attacks on the Soviet Union, not to permit any country to establish a protectorate over themselves, not to give their territory "on lease" for its possible use by any aggressor or would-be aggressor against the Soviet Union (p. 3).

According to this pamphlet, the Baltic countries did not meet these conditions:

> But both the foreign and home policy pursued by the governments of the Baltic States during the whole of the period under review, not only demonstrated their hostility to the Soviet Republic, but systematically violated precisely the one essential condition for peaceful, good-neighborly coexistence—the condition which, had it been respected, would have formed a real basis for their independence and self-determination and the maintenance of peace (pp. 31–32).

Therefore, it was concluded that:

> The Soviet Union could not but draw the only possible deduction from all these facts, and in 1940 it was constrained to demand that there should be a change in the Governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—since their hostility toward the U.S.S.R. threatened the complete subordination of the Baltic States to German fascism (p. 32).

As a matter of fact, it was the Soviet Union that established a protectorate in the Baltic countries, and transformed them into a place d'armes for the further expansion. It was the Soviet Union that concluded the pact with Nazi Germany and appropriated the Baltic States as her zone of influence. It was the Soviet Union that imposed on the Baltic States the pacts of mutual assistance and established military bases there. It was the Soviet Union that forced the Baltic countries to turn over their territories "on lease" to the Soviet Union. At the time the Soviet Union presented its charges in ultimatums to the Baltic countries, she had in these countries at least 50,000 to 60,000 troops. Thus, the so-called peaceful coexistence imposed upon the Baltic countries on Soviet terms led finally to the enslavement of Lithuania and the other Baltic countries.

International obligations, according to the Soviet doctrine, have only a limited validity for the Soviet Union, because the Soviet Union claims to be the only competent interpreter in matters of peace, equality, justice, and independence, and, therefore, it is the only state which has the right to reject or modify the existing rules of international law and its obligations. In 1940 Lithuania became victim of this same unilateral concept of international obligations. And this attitude toward international obligations remains unchanged today. There are no signs that the Soviet Union is ready to redress her injustices, and to adopt, in her relations with other countries, an approach which would correspond to the rules adopted by civilized nations, referred to by Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles when speaking of Soviet actions in the Baltic States on July 23, 1940:

> The policy of this government is universally known. The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities no matter whether they are carried out by the use of force or by threat of force. They are likewise opposed to any form of intervention on the part of one state, however powerful, in domestic concerns of any other sovereign state, however weak.
> The United States will continue to stand by these principles, because of the conviction of the American people that unless the doctrine in which these principles are inherent once again governs the relations between nations, the rule of reason, of justice, and of law—in other words, the basis of modern civilization itself—cannot be preserved.

International law is built upon the principle pacta sunt servanda. Coexistence at least implies respect of mutual obligations. The respect for promises is the basic principle of mutual understanding and constitutes the foundation of the international community. Analysis of the Soviet practice shows the lack even of such intentions on the part of the Soviet Union. Subjugation of Lithuania under the false pretext that Lithuania did not observe conditions of peaceful coexistence is the best example of disrespect of international obligations.

The Soviet Union, as a member of the United Nations, has the duty "to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the international obligations arising from the treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained"—preamble to the Charter of the United Nations.

Each member of the United Nations, the United States included, has not only the right, but also the duty, to require that international obligations be observed by the members of the United Nations, and that the wrongs committed by the Soviet Union in general, and against Lithuania in particular, be redressed.

Lithuania is an old nation in the European community. She has a long history, going far back to the 12th and 13th centuries. Lithuanian rights to national independence and statehood rest, apart from the generally accepted right of self-determination, upon her record of 800 years' existence as a nation-state. The services which Lithuania has rendered to the international community are very great, especially during the Middle Ages. And, again in the words of Sumner Welles:

> The people of the United States have watched their (the Baltic States) admirable progress in self-government with deep and sympathetic interest.

All efforts must be made toward the reestablishment of sovereign rights in this once independent and friendly nation.

Mr. BYRNE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the annual observance of the proclamation of Lithuanian independence declared on February 16, 1918, is a good time for all Americans to pause and reflect on the problems of the Lithuanians and other captive peoples suffering under the oppressive rule of the Soviet Union. Lithuania fell prey to the superior force of the Soviet Union on June 15, 1940, so that any celebration of the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence is marked by sorrow at the plight of the freedom-loving Lithuanian people.

The Lithuanians have been held in effective slavery and deprived of their human and property rights since 1940. The Soviet Union forced upon the people an illegal puppet government and fraudulently annexed Lithuania in direct violation of their Mutual Assistance Treaty of October 10, 1939 and the earlier nonaggression and peace treaties of July 12, 1920 and September 28, 1926. The Lithuanian people have been subjected to a Soviet plan of genocide which aims to eradicate the Lithuanian national conscience. Over 500,000 Lithuanians have been deported to Siberia or murdered by the Soviets. Soviet and other Communist people have been moved into Lithuania. The political freedoms and economic initiative of those remaining have been destroyed. The Iron Curtain has hidden the full story of the suffering of these brave people.

The plight of Lithuania and her Baltic neighbors was heedlessly overlooked in the confusion of World War II. However, the free nations of the world are becoming increasingly aware of the importance of this valiant country that has fought and struggled against tyranny for over a century and a quarter. The tragedy of Lithuania should serve as a reminder to all the free peoples of the world of the danger of Communist aggression. This annual commemoration of the proclamation of Lithuanian independence should serve to remind us that all freedom-loving people must stand resolute in their fight against communism and unite against the forces of evil.

Lithuania has a proud heritage and was a stronghold of Western European civilization in the 13th and 16th centuries. From 1918 until invaded again at the beginning of World War II by first Nazi Germany and then by the Red army, Lithuania was a model republic and made great strides economically and politically which gained the highest respect of all as a wonderful example of self-government.

All of us who hold the cause of freedom precious should do all we can to help Lithuania regain her independence. We can help them during this period when there is little they can do for themselves, by continuing to bring them hope through the Voice of America and other available means, by helping her displaced people find asylum in the United States, by continuing to condemn Soviet aggression in the Baltic States, and the enslavement of free peoples by force, by fraudulently annexing Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia.

This is the time when fellow Americans of Lithuanian descent are rededicating themselves to the cause of freedom and are helping to keep alive the great cultural heritage of Lithuania for their homeland which is now silenced under the heel of the Soviet Union. Let us join with them in the cause for independence for Lithuania and all the captive nations of the world with a message of hope and courage until Lithuania can again take her rightful place among the free nations of the world.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Lithuanian American Council, representing the majority of nearly 1 million Lithuanian Americans, for its service in helping to strengthen the hope of freedom in the hearts of all Lithuanians.

On the 41st anniversary of the restoration of independence of the Lithuanian state, we can appreciate the words of Milton that "None can love freedom heartily but good men." Certainly this history of the Lithuanian state from its beginning in the 11th century to its forcible incorporation into the Soviet Union during our generation shows a people with the flame of freedom in their souls and a light of knowledge in their eyes. Their actions between the two World Wars as leaders in the fight for peace and the struggle for progress helped achieve many fine accomplishments during those years.

It is fortunate that the United States has never recognized the incorporation of Lithuania and the other Baltic States into the Soviet Union. For, in the present world situation, it is to our advantage to have the friendship and cooperation of the Lithuanian people in our quest for world peace and security.

The persecution and tyranny which the Lithuanians are presently undergoing are, I know, a suffering at this time. I hope sincerely that soon it will be possible to see the restoration of Lithuania to independence and freedom.

Mr. DIGGS. Mr. Speaker, once again we are reminded of an historical event of great significance which took place over 40 years ago. On February 16, 1918, Lithuania proclaimed its national independence. In the ensuing years from 1918 to 1940, her valiant people made tremendous strides forward in the economic and social revival of their country after more than 100 years of tyrannical Russian rule. As a member of the League of Nations, the Republic of Lithuania dedicated itself to democratic principles and gave ample demonstration that it is fully deserving of membership in the family of free nations of the world. Soviet Russian forces succeeded in placing Lithuania in bondage again in 1940. Short-lived though open enjoyment of her independence was, Lithuania's spirit of freedom is today as strong and unconquerable as it ever was.

Compared to the great heroism and courage of the people of Lithuania, despite 18 years of Soviet despotism, brutality, and culture strangling, it is a small thing we do to take a moment on this day to commemorate their independence and assure them of our own unwavering faith in the ultimate retriumph of that independence.

Lithuanians are not today the masters of their soil, but, most importantly, they remain the undisputed masters of their own free souls. It is a privilege to join in this fitting tribute to them.

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to join other colleagues of mine in the House today to pay tribute to the Republic of Lithuania on the occasion of the 41st anniversary of the restoration of her independence. Like her Baltic neighbors, Latvia and Estonia, the peoples of Lithuania have now been under totalitarian rule, either Nazi or Communist, ever since 1940. The meager information that we receive in the free world nevertheless bears every evidence that the spirit of freedom burns as brightly in Lithuania as it did on that memorable day 41 years ago when Lithuania became again a free nation.

The restoration of Lithuania's independence in 1918 followed many years of brutal enslavement and occupation by foreign powers. The fact that the spirit of Lithuanian freedom remained alive during all that time is a heartening proof that Lithuanians, even though in chains, never lost their desire for the God-given rights of independence and self-determination. I hope and trust it will encourage them in their struggle against Communist tyranny to know that our own country and indeed the peoples of the entire free world are with them in their fight for freedom and that we all believe that liberation from foreign enslavement will again come to Lithuania as well as the other corresponding nations and peoples now in the grip of international Communists. By continuing to recognize Lithuania as a sovereign state, our Government has given yet another proof of the fact that it is not prepared to acquiesce in totalitarian conquests in defiance of international commitments and the moral principles that should be common to all mankind.

It is my pleasure to salute the people of Lithuania on this memorable anniversary as well as to pay tribute to the thousands of American citizens of Lithuanian origin who are personally determined to do all in their power to restore freedom to their homeland. In this memorable cause the work of the Lithuanian American Council and the Lithuanian American Information Center are worthy of particular note. I am glad to join my other colleagues in Congress in extending our greetings at this time and to pledge our continued efforts to do all in our power to insure that the sacrifices which have been made in the name of Lithuanian independence shall not have been in vain.

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 41st anniversary of Lithuania's declaration of independence after many years of annexation to the Russian Empire. The United States was one of the first countries to recognize the Lithuanian independence. I am honored and proud today to join my colleagues in the House in celebrating this 41st anniversary of the Lithuanian independence.

To these friends of ours this day will be a day of dedication to the past, to the memory of the brave people of Lithuania who have remained unsubdued in spirit even though imprisoned by Soviet tyranny.

The present situation in Lithuania is of grave concern to Lithuanian Americans, the majority of whom have kinfolks in the old country. Lithuania is a veritable prison. Few people are permitted to leave the country and visitors are not allowed; thousands of her sons and daughters have been murdered through political execution, planned starvation and exile to death camps; deportations have scattered other thousands throughout the vast Soviet empire; her people are forced to go to the Soviet Union, as "volunteer laborers."

Nevertheless, the memory of liberty survives in Lithuania. The theory that Lithuania or any other comparative nation of central Europe rejoices in their slavery to Moscow fools nobody and silences nobody who does not have to live under Russian bayonets.

Such a nation is Lithuania and such people are entitled, not only to our sympathy and our moral support, but to our active, effective assistance in forwarding their high aims for the recapture of their liberties and the reestablishment of their sovereignty.

Our own great Nation must make it abundantly clear to all other nations that we stand for liberalization from tyranny and oppression and for self-determination and freedom of choice for all people to ordain and to establish their own form of government under democratic processes.

The enslavement of Lithuania is one of the worst crimes of the Soviet Union. God grant that deliverance may come soon.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, today I join with my colleagues and friends of Lithuania in paying tribute to the courageous people of that land. All of America is richer for the contributions men and women of Lithuanian descent have made to our national strength and cultural heritage.

It is well that we who have met here today interrupt our usual routine and applaud the Lithuanian determination to be free and salute those who have kept that spark of freedom alive. All Americans are indebted to their persistent efforts which have refused to let us forget that the spirit of democracy needs periodic refreshing. Too often we are inclined to take freedom and equal opportunities for granted, as being as natural as the air we breathe, forgetting the struggle of our forefathers to obtain it and unmindful of those around us who have never enjoyed the privilege.

The annual anniversary celebration of Lithuanian independence with its rededication to the principles of tolerance, liberty, of basic human rights, for human dignity, for the freedom of the press and religion rekindles the eternal spark of universal freedom now threatened with suffocation in many parts of the world. Would that the echo of our voices from this Hall supporting Lithuanian aspirations and objectives resound throughout the world.

Ultimately, we believe all voices of peoples desiring freedom will coalesce into a thundering sound and the full force of their determination will tumble the pillars of dictatorial structures.

In this swiftly revolving world of power politics and economic change no nation, not even Russia, can hold out indefinitely against the forces of justice and equality. In the new world which must be born if we are to live in this space age among our nuclear gadgets and weapons, the zigzag history of Lithuanian freedom is destined to join others in a broad and uninterrupted channel of progressive evolution spanning a sea of harmony and peace and good will and the brotherhood of man.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I deem it a great privilege to join my colleagues in paying tribute to the Lithuanian people upon the 41st anniversary of their independence.

Fate is not expected to be kind to all peoples and nations. Some have been more fortunate in possessing the requisite power, and also the luck, to shape their own destiny. Others, particularly the small nations, lacking the power for the mastery of their future and finding that they are not among the lucky ones, have often been victims of some untoward events or have suffered under other powerful nations. The Lithuanians have been among the unlucky ones.

This unfortunate but gallant nation has had its glories in a distant past, but since the late 18th century its destiny was in the hands of Russia's autocratic czars. In 1917, as the result of the Russian revolution, when that wretched regime was overthrown, Lithuanians had the chance of realizing their centuries-old dream. They proclaimed their independence and established their own democratic form of government. Amid multiple handicaps and hardships, they worked their way out of misery and chaos. Their independence was recognized by other sovereign nations; Lithuania was admitted into the League of Nations, and thus once again she joined the community of nations.

For about two decades, during the interwar years, hardworking, industrious, sturdy, and tenacious Lithuanians rebuilt their war-torn, ruined country. In time it became one of the most prosperous and progressive democracies in that part of Europe. And the people enjoyed their freedom to the full. But the turn of international events over which they had no control threatened their independence, even their very existence. In 1940 their worst apprehensions were justified, when they were forced to agree to have Red army forces stationed in their country. In mid-June of that same year Red forces occupied the whole country. They established their own type of government which immediately "asked" that the country be incorporated into the Soviet Union. That was done on July 21, 1940. Thus came the end of free and independent Lithuania.

During the last war Lithuanians changed their unwanted masters more than once; for more than 2 years the country was held under Nazi occupation. Toward the end of the war the Nazis were evicted and their place was once more taken by Communist Russians. And they have been there ever since. Today they rule over Lithuania with an iron hand, inflexible in its ruthlessness and cruel efficiency. Gone are the days of freedom and democracy. There is no freedom of movement, of speech, and of expression. Every act of the Lithuanian citizen is formulated and dictated by the minions of the Kremlin, and their orders are carried out irrespective of the human and material costs. Today Lithuanians in their homeland live in a large prison camp, and they all pray for deliverance and freedom.

On this 41st anniversary of their Independence Day, they have our heartfelt sympathy. Although we in the free world cannot do much for them immediately, yet we can pay tribute to their courage and their energy. Those of Lithuanian descent, and they are well represented in my Third Congressional District, are honorable representatives of their ancestral home. By their qualities they enrich our Nation's life as our Nation provides them with opportunities for fruitful work. We salute the people of Lithuania on the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day.

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, for a number of reasons it is appropriate for us in the United States to share in the celebration of the anniversary of the restoration of Lithuanian independence. That day in February 41 years ago when the voice of Lithuania was heard throughout the world announcing its freedom from Russian bondage was one of the milestones in the age-old struggle of the forces of liberty against the tyranny of might. It was a milestone for age-old Lithuania, and a milestone in the political evolution of civilized people.

The Lithuania of 1918 was one of the countries which emerged in response to the Wilsonian demand for the self-determination of peoples. When President Wilson influenced the political contours of the map of Europe, after World War I, he was but voicing the sentiment of the people of the United States, since their emergence as a nation, in favor of the idea that all men should have a voice in the settlement of their own political status, in the right of a homogeneous population to determine the form of government under which their territory should be governed. This principle we in the United States believe in; and the spirit which persists in this thought we honor.

The Lithuanian people of yesterday and of today have maintained their belief in the right of men to be free—to be independent politically, socially, culturally. When in 1918 this belief came to fruition, the emergence of Lithuania was a reemergence. It was not only the birth of their nation for the then current generation; it was a rebirth of the Lithuania of old. For Lithuania was already at least as old as the Christian era. Since Tacitus in the first century A.D. first made mention of the name Lithuania, that name had appeared and reappeared as an entity down the centuries of European history.

The language of Lithuania bears witness to this fact. This language, like no other in Europe, excepting only that of the Basques, had preserved the marks of antiquity in remarkable purity. It has been the mark of a people who have maintained their independence throughout the vicissitudes of almost 2,000 years of rugged history. Despite the smallness of the group, despite the buffetings of a bitter fate, this tiny cluster of homogeneous folk tossed about among its neighboring colossi—by the barbaric hordes in the Middle Ages, by the ransacking armies of modern history—despite all the power against them, the Lithuanians have remained a people unto themselves.

Battling the Russians independently in the 11th century, resisting Germans, Poles, and Russians in the 13th, merging with the Poles—politically—for the next six centuries, only to be dominated with them again and again by Russia, these brave and hardy people nevertheless kept their personality, their individuality. Lithuania was able to withstand all this and more.

When, in 1918, the independence of the Lithuanian people was restored, it was a marvelous and a memorable event. It was not the less so because it was to be short lived. Germans and Russians were to battle again over this little country in World War II; and again Russia—Soviet Russia—was to dominate it politically. The spirit of Lithuania has never been dominated. The personality of the Lithuanian people was to endure as it had endured down through the ages. The many-faceted contributions of the Lithuanians to society, to the development of civilization, in Europe and in America, have a distinct place in the greater than their persistence in indeannals of the centuries. None has been pendence.

It is gratifying to take part in a celebration of significance to free men everywhere. We salute Lithuanian Independence Day.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, February 16, 1959, marks the 41st anniversary of the restoration of the independence of Lithuania.

The Iron Curtain has dropped upon the good people of Lithuania, but no Iron Curtain can extinguish the love of liberty which was so brilliantly established 41 years ago. The voices of liberty can be stilled, but only for a little while, because the history of mankind again and again has proven that those who have once tasted of liberty can never again relinquish it forever.

The dream of liberty in its essence is a faith that cannot and will not be denied, a faith in the goodness of mankind, a faith based upon individual responsibility. All this is brought to consciousness on the commemorative date of February 16.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, it is most fitting on this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence that all Americans pay tribute to freedom-loving Lithuanians everywhere and to their country. In commemorating this day we honor Lithuania—small in size but great in spirit.

Since the 13th century, Lithuania has enjoyed periods of liberty and self-government but has also been the victim of attack and domination. Yet it has maintained its spirit and belief in the dignity of human liberty and has continued to fight for freedom. The First World War brought a new era for the courageous people of Lithuania. On February 16, 1918, they proclaimed their independence. During the following two decades this democratic republic made rapid progress as a proud member of the community of nations.

Unfortunately, World War II marked the end of liberty for Lithuania. Once again she was engulfed and her freedom extinguished. In 1940, Lithuania was seized by Russia, this time to fall under the domination of communism. Her people have suffered shameful persecutions and hardships at the hands of the Communists and yet they continue to resist this tyranny, and work for the day when they will again be free.

The people of Lithuania are dedicated to the principle of individual liberty and national independence; they have stanchly maintained their national identity in spite of their long-term enslavement. We are confident that the Lithuanian people will never cease in their efforts to gain liberty. Their faith has emerged triumphantly in the past and will do so in the future.

We proudly join our fellow Americans of Lithuanian descent and freedom-loving people everywhere in offering tribute to and prayers for a valiant people, destined to emerge victorious over Communist oppression in enduring independence and in final freedom.

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, another anniversary of the independence of the little Baltic Republic of Lithuania—the 41st anniversary in the annals of that captive nation's history—is being observed on February 16. Unfortunately, the people of Lithuania are not free to partake of this event or to commemorate it in freedom.

The hopes and aspirations of the Lithuanian nation, those living under the tyrannous yoke of communism as well as their kinsmen in the free world, have not been erased either by time or by Moscow's deceitful campaigns of smiles or of coexistence. Their faith in God and in the future survival of their people continues to remain strong. They will never abandon their efforts to attain freedom and liberation from communism.

Each year on this occasion they wait for a word of encouragement from us, a word of sympathetic understanding from the people of the free world, a sign of genuine friendship from freedom-loving people everywhere. It remains for us to help them sustain their faith in God and in humanity, faith in their own inevitable freedom and in their survival. This means a great deal to them in these dark hours of desperation.

May this anniversary of their independence serve as a ray of bright hope to the people of Lithuania and their kinsmen in America. We express our solidarity with them in their holy struggle. Together with them we pray that their ancestral home will once again be a free and independent country in their lifetime.

Mr. FINO. Mr. Speaker, the Lithuanian people lived in their historic homeland on the eastern shores of the Baltic centuries before the discovery of America, and they had constituted their independent state long before the rise of some modern states in Europe. Though they form one of the small European nations, they have made their place secure in the history of Europe by their valorous deeds and glorious accomplishments. During the 14th and 15th centuries they ruled over a great kingdom, one of the strongest in northeastern Europe, and at times were a real force in opposing the Asiatic incursions into Europe. Then for two centuries the kingdom was united with the Kingdom of Poland, and in the 18th century when Poland was partitioned, and a part of it fell to Russia, Lithuania also came under Russian rule. Thus toward the end of that century Lithuania became a province of the Russian Empire, and so it remained until World War I.

Toward the end of that war, when the czarist regime in Russia was shattered, Lithuanians saw the chance of regaining their freedom. On February 16 of 1918 they proclaimed their independence and established a republic. Thenceforth for more than two decades they enjoyed their freedom to the full, and literally recreated their war-ravaged and run-down country. In this relatively short time they made great advances in all phases of their national life, and they were all contented and happy. But as a small nation they were living under apprehensions and fears, always suspecting aggressive designs of their powerful totalitarian neighbors, particularly those of the Soviet Union. Unfortunately their worst fears found justification. Soon after the outbreak of the last war the Red army treacherously marched into the country, occupied it, and in July it was made part of the Soviet Union.

Since those days poor Lithuanians have not known freedom. In their homeland, with many thousands driven to various parts of the Soviet empire, they have been leading the life of imprisoned slave laborers. Their country still remains under the heels of Russian Communists, and there they are bottled up behind the Iron Curtain; none is allowed to move out and no one from the free world is permitted to visit. They are all forced to work and produce for their hard taskmasters, and of course they enjoy none of the freedoms which we regard in the free world as our birthright. They cannot and are not allowed to celebrate their national independence day. But we in the free world, in observing the 41st anniversary of that historic event, gladly echo their patriotic and fine sentiments, and hope that someday they will be free to do the same in their homeland.

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Speaker, February 16 marks the 41st anniversary of the proclamation of independence of the Lithuanian people. I am proud and eager to associate myself with the other Members of the House in calling this event to the attention of the American people.

A glance at the history of Lithuania reveals a gallant people, industrious and freedom loving. The country suffered for 123 years under czarist Russia. The independence declared in 1918 was lost again to Communist Russia in 1940.

Our own American history pays tribute to the Lithuanians who helped tame our frontiers and who now constitute a valuable element of America. These Lithuanian-Americans pause today and join with all free people in celebrating the tragically brief independence of valiant Lithuania. The little Baltic State itself is deprived of being able to celebrate; indeed there is little to celebrate for Russian domination has abrogated all the joys of freedom. To the Lithuanians, February 16 is a reminder of a glorious goal they hope to regain, and a reminder of the oath they cherish to overthrow the alien elements who are suppressing their liberty.

On this occasion of the 41st Anniversary of Lithuania's National Independence, I want to remind Lithuanians and Americans alike that the United States has never recognized the Soviet annexation of the Baltic States. But we do realize the presence of an unwelcome intruder who has enslaved the country. We realize, also, that this enslavement is doomed as long as the will for freedom and independence exists in the heart of Lithuania.

We, in America, led by the loyal Lithuanian-Americans, commemorate not only the proclamation of Lithuania's independence but also the spirit prevailing today in that country which assures us that independence will be reborn.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, revolutions cause death to innocent peoples and untold amount of unnecessary destruction; in this respect they are like wars. The Russian revolution of 1917 seemed, at least at the time, to usher in a new era not only for the Russians, but also for numerous ethnic groups in the czarist empire. Many hitherto suppressed nationalities found their salvation in that revolution, and many of them proclaimed their independence soon after that world-rocking event. The Lithuanian independence was thus a child of the Russian revolution of 1917.

Since the late 18th century, Lithuania had become part of czarist Russia and for more than 100 years Lithuanians had to endure the oppressive yoke of Russia's stern and autocratic regime. The czar's callous and cruel officials during that long period did all in their power to eradicate and uproot all signs and symbols of Lithuanian nationalism. All national celebrations were tabooed and proscribed; the study and use of the Lithuanian language was discouraged; the show of Lithuanian national traits and feelings were regarded with suspicion, and those displaying any sign of independence were closely watched, and faced imprisonment. Yet despite these stern and strict measures the Lithuanians retained their sense of nationality. They venerated their national traditions, clung steadfastly to their ideals, and longed for their national independence. The Russian Revolution of 1917 offered them the opportunity to attain their national political independence.

On February 16, 41 years ago, Lithuanians regained their freedom and proclaimed their independence. In the enjoyment of that freedom they worked ceaselessly and tirelessly, and in the course of two decades, during the interwar years, they rebuilt their war-ravaged country as a model of prosperous and progressive democracy. Then came the Second World War, which in the course of its first year swallowed independent Lithuania and made it, much against the wishes of the helpless Lithuanians, part of the Soviet Union.

Since 1940, except for the 2-year period during the war, the unfortunate Lithuanians have been oppressed by the tyrannical government imposed upon them by the Communist rulers of the Kremlin. There they suffer in misery and under conditions approaching servitude beneath the heel of their detested and despised overlords. At the same time, in their hearts they all cherish the hope that someday, somehow, freedom and independence may dawn over their heads in their historic and beloved homeland. I am glad to join loyal and liberty-loving and proud Americans of Lithuanian descent who, in observing the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, echo the true feelings and sentiments of oppressed Lithuanians in unfree Lithuania.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, Lithuania, with the poisoned fangs of communism penetrating her national heart, celebrates the memory of her 41st anniversary of the independence proclamation, now physically dead nearly 19 years.

Lithuania can, with fervent prayers, thank God for the undying friendship of America. The United States has never given its approval, or given official recognition, of the illegal seizure of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union.

The Lithuanian people were an independent nation 400 years before the discovery of America. Her culture and spiritual contributions to Christianity are the legends of antiquity. Although she is no longer free, her sacrifices and prayerful yearning to regain what was lost before—in 1795—and regained on February 16, 1918, when a number of small nations were restored their independence and freedom, Lithuania lived again as a sovereign nation.

And 19 years ago Lithuania fell again, under the lash of the Russian hordes, and now lies oppressed; on the pages of history, written by great nations without conscience, and steeped in the blood of the patriots of the underground, who ever keep the vigil, sparking freedom's holy light since the June 15, 1940, slaughter.

Lithuania awaits its chance. This brave race, cultured in the glory of their great tradition of freedom, dating before the Christian era, steeled to tolerance and suffering, awaits with prayers and courage the day ending Soviet slavery, tyranny, and domination.

America will break the illegal seizure of these little nations throughout Europe and the Baltic area. These nations will be rescued from enslavement by the repudiation of the Russian lie against Christianity. It will be an internal eruption, and upon that day we must stand by our friends, who have struggled for the same freedoms as those of the liberty-loving Americans.

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 41st anniversary of a glorious step in mankind's march for full liberty and freedom.

It was on February 16, 1918, that the people of Lithuania proclaimed their independence and announced the birth of the Republic of Lithuania.

This new Republic, whose history as a nation traces back through many centuries, grew and thrived. It held an honored place in the community of nations. But World War II brought this valiant country again under a new Russion oppression, and in 1940 the Soviet Union, in violation of all laws of man and morality, made Lithuania a part of Soviet Russia.

In the years since 1940, heroic Lithuania has been under Communist dictatorship. Many of its people, we are reliably informed, have been deported from their homeland to work as slave laborers in Siberia.

But still the burning hope of freedom glows bright in the hearts of the Lithuanian people. And today, on Lithuanian Independence Day, the prayers of millions of men, women, and children of Lithuanian ancestry are rising heavenward—prayers that one day in the not too distant future the Republic of Lithuania will stand again as a free and independent nation.

We, in Connecticut, are proud of the great contributions made to our State by sons and daughters of Lithuania. We join our prayers with theirs on this day.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, today is a day of both joy and sorrow for the people of Lithuania. Since the 16th century Lithuanians have known a short 42 years of freedom. This small but intensely proud nation has been buffeted about by Russia, Germany, and Poland during almost the entire span of modern history, yet their desire for national identity has never wavered.

As illustrative of this fact, immediately after World War I, in the midst of the Russian revolution, the Lithuanian people proclaimed their independence. This act was based on the precepts of President Wilson's 14 points. The state of Lithuania was recognized by the rest of the world as a sovereign sister of the international community of nations. In all too short a time the terror of World War II befell our world. After 2 crushing years of Nazi occupation the hope of freedom regained burst forth in the minds and hearts of Lithuanians everywhere. The hope was ruthlessly smothered by the Soviet Union. For all practical purposes Lithuania is now a part of the U.S.S.R., her Government under the shadow of the hammer and sickle.

It is significant that we in the United States have never recognized this Soviet domination on any diplomatic level. The position of Lithuania must change of necessity. The hearts and minds of the Lithuanian people demand freedom. The Soviet rule by terror cannot relax its grip on a people that make this demand.

There are many men and women of Lithuanian descent here in the United States. They have added to the strength, diversity, and culture of our land. For all that Lithuania stands for, it is with pleasure that I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to these courageous people. True, it is a solemn tribute, for there is much to overcome before the reality of freedom can live in Lithuania again. The spirit of freedom is indomitable; Lithuania will be free.

Mr. MACHROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the gallant Lithuanian nation on the occasion of the 41st anniversary of the independence of that country.

On February 16, 1918, Lithuania declared her independence to the entire world. Today Lithuania is not free for, in June 1940, her lands and institutions were unjustly seized by Soviet Russia and to this date her people have been undergoing persecution and tyranny.

My experience on the special Katyn Massacre Committee and, subsequently, on the Kersten Committee on Communist Aggression, a few years ago, has given me access to facts which give astounding testimony to the great love for liberty and freedom of the Lithuanian people, and of their brave resistance to Communist aggression.

Those who still believe in the possibility of peaceful coexistence with brutal Communist tyranny, and with a regime which has no respect for solemn agreements, should read carefully the testimony and evidence submitted to the congressional Committee on Communist Aggression. They will learn that the occupation of Lithuania by the Communists began with a peaceful coexistence which soon was replaced by armed occupation, murders, and mass deportations.

On this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, let us remind ourselves of the fact that freedom-loving peoples throughout the world have the God-given right to be free, and that no one may deprive them of that right.

Let us look realistically upon the situation as it exists today. Appeasement and acts of weakness on our part can only bring closer to our doors the menace of Communist occupation as it is known today in Lithuania.

I join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the gallant Lithuanian nation and pray that we may have the wisdom and courage to face the future with faith and confidence in our ideals and in our way of life.

I express the hope that, through Divine Providence, the day is not too far distant that the Lithuanian people and all others now under the domination of Communist regimes will again enjoy the freedom that they so deeply desire and which is so close to their hearts.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, Lithuanian Independence Day is an occasion for celebration wherever Lithuanians are gathered together in the free world. Here in the United States we join gladly in honoring a people whose perseverance, whose love of liberty, and whose hardihood of character have withstood the grimmest tests of fate. Lithuania has known the most severe and prolonged eras of political misfortune that any country in Europe has had to endure. Yet the Lithuanian character has emerged practically intact.

Although the Lithuania which we honor on this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day was by some counts a country young in the annals of modern states, it was in actuality old in history—older than any other part of Europe, in fact, or at least as old as any; for only the Basques can boast as ancient a lineage. The purity of the Lithuanian language bears witness to the enduring qualities of a people whom we find being mentioned by Tacitus, in the 1st century A.D.; whom we find in the 20th century maintaining a purity of character and of culture never dissolved, in spite of hundreds of years of political subjugation.

Lithuania emerged as a state at various intervals during the intervening centuries. It emerged only to be swallowed up again by its mighty neighbors. But it was never absorbed.

These emergings, these periods of political independence were the outbursts of a spirit which has endured through all the vicissitudes of the centuries. The Lithuanians have exhibited a hardihood, a solidarity, and a determination to retain their independence of spirit, of character, and of culture, such as have few people on this earth.

Because of these indomitable marks of distinction, the Lithuanian people have made distinct and valuable contributions to the society in which they find themselves. We in the United States have benefited from their settlements among us. Their music, their art, their industry, their charity, and their loyalty to their own have bettered the communities where they are. Above all, their independence of spirit is the hallmark which we recognize in joining in the celebration of Lithuanian Independence Day.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, once again it is my privilege to join with my colleagues here on the floor of the House of Representatives to pay tribute to the valiant nation of Lithuania which today should be celebrating the anniversary of its independence. As we all know Lithuania proclaimed her independence on February 16, 1918. Unfortunately, that independence was shortlived. The tragic story of the brutal assault of this noble and courageous nation by Soviet Russia has been repeated many times.

As I indicated a year ago on this same occasion, it is a sobering thought to realize that for the people of Lithuania this day cannot be other than a day of sadness. We in America, who so rightly cherish our own Independence Day, can well understand the feeling of sorrow that all Americans of Lithuanian ancestry must have at the realization that that great nation has been denied the very right to exist under a government of its own choosing.

The contribution of the Lithuanians in America and their descendants gives us some idea of the national vitality of that country. It is an indication that confidence and faith in Lithuania's future is well placed. The regime imposed on Lithuania has violated everything which free men hold dear. That it has not been completely successful in its endeavor is due only to the strong inborn love the Lithuanian people have for the cherished principles of freedom and liberty. These principles are the same elements of moral law which we Americans hold in such high esteem and which have guided our great country from its inception. To be true to ourselves, we must, of necessity, be true to valiant Lithuania. It must be our solemn pledge that we shall never compromise those principles and that we shall not rest until Lithuania is free. Let it be our fervent prayer that our sister country soon have the shackles of oppression removed and may God grant that it happen soon.

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in calling to the attention of the House the 41st anniversary of the independence of Lithuania.

In 1918 after 123 years of Russian rule, Lithuania was proclaimed free. The Lithuanian people achieved independence as the result of a great nationalist political and cultural revival which took place in spite of all previous Russian efforts to obliterate Lithuanian national sentiment.

Lithuania flourished in freedom for an all-too-short 22 years. Then came that tragic day when the Soviet Army swept into that free country, killing hundreds of men, women, and children, exiling the most ardent nationalists to Siberia, and placing both the territory and institutions under Soviet military control.

We of the House of Representatives, speaking in the name of all Americans, pay tribute to the brave citizens of Lithuania, whether they are in Soviet captivity inside Lithuania, whether they are exiled to Siberia, or whether they are now part of the Lithuanian community of America.

We congratulate them for their persistence, for their bravery, and for their high ideals and love of freedom. We join with them in praying that they may see the eventual restoration of Lithuania to the people of Lithuania, and the end of Soviet domination in Eastern Europe.

In the meantime, I urge this body to consider the liberalization of United States immigration laws to permit recent escapees from communism to emigrate here, and to keep families together.

I urge both the Government and leaders in private industry to assist the intellectuals and aged exiles from Iron Curtain countries to acquire new skills for employment.

I urge all Americans today to join with all people of the world who truly love freedom in sympathizing with the plight of the people who are prohibited from voicing their innate longing for liberty.

Let us work for the day when the Lithuanian people shall again be free to join a world where a desire for peace can be respected and international trust prevail.

Mr. LIPSCOMB. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the freedom-loving Lithuanians throughout the world, who, on February 16, 1959, will observe the 41st anniversary of their national independence.

The Lithuanians were among the first of many nationality groups who shook off imperial Russia's czarist regime toward the end of the First World War and regained their long-lost independence. Unfortunately, they were also among the first to be robbed of their independence early in the last war by their former oppressors. For more than a century, from late 18th century until 1918, they suffered under the autocratic czarist regime. Their material losses were immense, and physically they suffered hardships and miseries, but spiritually they were unscathed. The unwieldy and inefficient Russian regime could not stamp out the Lithuanian national traits; the czar's agents were incapable of eradicating the spirit of freedom and independence among the Lithuanians. Stoutly and courageously these few million people held their own against the powers of the czars and defied Russian authorities when attempts were made to Russianize them, and submerge them in the one big Russian maelstrom. They were ready to sacrifice all their wordly possessions and, if necessary, submit to imprisonment and exile, but were unwilling to give up their beliefs and their long-cherished national ideals. They clung to them tenaciously and steadfastly, and when the time came to assert their independence they seized upon the occasion and proclaimed the emergence of the Lithuanian Republic. That was done on February 16, 1918, 41 years ago today.

Thereafter for a number of years the people went through indescribable difficulties. The war-ravaged country had to be built, the needy and hungry people had to be fed, and the governmental machinery just instituted had to be put into efficient working order. More important and perhaps most crucial of all was the organization of the country's defense forces for the maintenance of its newly won independence. In time, however, these difficulties were overcome, many problems were solved, and independent Lithuania progressed steadily. She became a member of the League of Nations, and played her part in world affairs honorably and well. In the course of almost two decades she was regarded as a prosperous and progressive country. But this happy situation did not last long; or, perhaps it is more correct to say, that Lithuania's envious, aggressive and powerful neighbors did not allow it to last long. The deadliest and the most implacable of Lithuania's enemies was the Soviet Union, and the masters of that country saw to it that democratic Lithuania did not remain free and independent. The outbreak of the Second World War foreshadowed the doom of many small independent free states; and Lithuania was no exception. Early in 1940, under some outrageous pretext, Stalin's forces occupied the country, and in July of that year it was annexed to the Soviet Union.

During the war Lithuanians suffered much. Many thousands of them were exiled to various parts of the Soviet Union, and those who were allowed to remain in their homeland were forced to work as slaves for their Communist overlords. When the Nazis occupied the country and held it for about 2 years, the lot of the poor Lithuanian was no better; he had to work hard in Hitler's labor force to keep his fighting machinery going. Then toward the end of that war the Communists returned once more, and this time with more fury and acted more ferociously. Since then the destiny of Lithuania has been wedded to the whims and wiles of the masters in the Kremlin.

Today Lithuania is one large prison camp in which some 3 million innocent and helpless but courageous and liberty-loving people are driven to work under most wretched and unenviable conditions for their Communist bosses. There all worldly possessions are owned and controlled by the Soviet state. They are the slaves of the most totalitarian dictatorship known to man, and the men operating that dictatorial regime have no concern for the welfare and livelihood of their unfortunate subjects. Being sealed off from the outside world, we in the free world know little of their actual status, but what little we know is sad and tragic. They have no freedom of any kind, not even the freedom to celebrate the anniversary of their unforgotten and unforgettable independence day. In this free country, in this hospitable home of true democracy, I join all Americans of Lithuanian descent in the observance of that memorable event, the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 41st anniversary of the declaration of independence of the Republic of Lithuania. I would like to join with Americans of Lithuanian ancestry and with freedom loving peoples everywhere in commemorating this important date, and in expressing our deepest sympathy for the present plight of the Lithuanian people.

In spite of the long years of enslavement by the Communists, the Lithuanian people have preserved their strong national feelings and kept alive the will for freedom. The desire for freedom is a powerful spiritual force. The human spirit will survive many hardships, and it can outlast the effect of any weapon of destruction. It is this human spirit which will decide the winner in the struggle between freedom and totalitarianism. We must continue to encourage this source of strength by pledging ourselves once again to the task of building a better world in which all nations may live in peace, freedom and justice.

On this 41st anniversary of the declaration of independence of the Republic of Lithuania, I join my colleagues in the House of Representatives in commemorating this date, and in expressing our hope that the Lithuanian nation will once again take its rightful place with the free nations of the world.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, on this observance of Lithuanian Independence Day, we remind ourselves and the world of the Treaty of Moscow, signed on July 12, 1920, whereby Soviet Russia recognized Lithuania as a sovereign and independent State, and renounced forever all her claims to Lithuanian territory.

The subsequent betrayal of that solemn pledge is not surprising. It is characteristic of communism.

Other nations have been betrayed by the conspirators in the Kremlin. The latest victim, Hungary.

Americans, who have had no personal experience with Communist terror and treachery must be warned, again and again, so that our Nation will never enter into any agreement with the Communist world that cannot be enforced.

Lithuania acted in good faith, but that was not enough to protect her sovereignty from the Communists whose ambition is to dominate the world.

The United States has never recognized the brutal annexation of Lithuania and never will. We are happy that, every year, we have this opportunity as Members of Congress who represent the American people, to declare, clearly and firmly, that we will never bargain away the sacred rights of Lithuania, or any other captive nation, in return for Soviet offers to settle other questions.

Moscow, take notes.

We mean every word of our pledge to the people of Lithuania, that we will work unremittingly for the inevitable liberation of their country.

What is right is right and no amount of Soviet propaganda or power politics can alter the fact that Lithuania was forcibly robbed of her independence. There will never be peace in Europe until her independence, and that of the other captive nations, are restored. Communist Russia must make restitution.

Three million Lithuanians in the homeland pray for that happy day.

In this they are joined by free men everywhere whose conscience will not be satisfied until the Russian occupation forces are withdrawn from that Baltic State never to return.

The faith of the Lithuanian people has proved stronger than the tyrants who come and go.

That faith will be vindicated when Lithuania is free again and forevermore.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, it is most fitting that we should pause today to celebrate Lithuanian Independence Day, and once again with grateful hearts pay our sincere tributes to the great and noble Lithuanian people.

Most Americans have their roots somewhere in Europe, and all of us realize the terrible scourge of persecution, cruelty, and oppression that was and is the lot of many peoples behind the Iron Curtain or in so-called satellite lands.

I could recite at length the glorious history of the proud Lithuanian people. I could embellish their virtues, passion for liberty, and willingness to bleed and die for freedom, their inconquerable spirit, impressive culture, and happy family life, their imperishable contributions to free government and inestimable gifts of loyalty and richly constructive citizenship in our own great country.

Many such words will be spoken here and elsewhere today and they will all be so true, so accurate, so well deserved. It is well that these generous words should be spoken to remind the world of the glories of Lithuania and the stalwart, age-old devotion of its people to every good cause.

Commendable, welcome, and fitting as these words of recognition, praise, and eulogy may be, they do not discharge in full measure our obligation to stand by the Lithuanian people and other oppressed peoples. Something more than mere words are needed today; something more than hopes for their liberation and deliverance from tyranny.

What this Congress must do in this day and age is to act in their behalf, in behalf of all the enslaved peoples of the world, to strike out with the energy, influence, and resources we have for the Lithuanians, for the Poles, for the Latvians, for the Rumanians, for the Serbs, for the Hungarians, and Czechs and Slavs, and all those who are beaten down today under the whiplash of the bestial Communist police state.

Let us act at once to sound throughout the world the cry of liberation, the demand for the release of oppressed peoples from abominable slavery. In the midst of all the prattling and the threats that we hear day by day, hour by hour, in propaganda outbursts that the Soviet will wantonly destroy us with its new weapons, this Nation must remain calm, cool, and collected. We are deeply resentful at all the threats, insults, slurs, and derision directed against us.

Let us dispassionately consider the source from which these mockeries come. Let us recognize who and what our enemy is and who means to destroy us. Let us not welcome that enemy here. Let us not hug and embrace him for shooting down our peacebound airmen. Let us cast that enemy from our gates. Let us renounce all his works and soundly and publicly and loudly condemn his evil intentions to conquer mankind and subject everyone in the world to his type of police state, denounce his repeated outrages against international order, honor, and peace.

The time has come for this Nation to stand firm and resolute. We have thoughtlessly taken enough insults. We have listened to enough dire threats. We have been surfeited with enough crude derision. Now let us make it clear to the world that we do not propose to take it any more.

What I propose once again on this great day of Lithuanian independence is the adoption of a strong, affirmative policy that will serve notice to the Soviet and the people of the world just where we stand on these great issues of freedom, human honor and decency and peace. Unless we can get definite assurance that tirades, assaults, abuses, and internal conspiracies against us shall cease, we should seriously consider the early recall of our Ambassador from Moscow and termination of diplomatic relations. At the same time, if we could induce our allies in the free world to take a similar position, it would not be long before the brazen, hostile operations of the Communist conspiracy in the free world would be isolated and confined. This result would be welcomed by free peoples. It would strengthen the free world.

The time has come when we must courageously assume the risk of taking a strong, unyielding position. The risk of a firm policy is less than that of waiting, temporizing, and delaying until the Soviet is prepared to attack. Our foreign policy cannot be based on surrender to blandishments and threats.

The next war may be over in a few days. The winner could well be the one that gets in the first blow. We might be brought to our knees, but the potential enemy would be on his back. If we want to help subject peoples and restore once great nations to their place in the family of nations we must be resolute now. Further delay may be fatal to free government here and throughout the world and to our own survival.

Long live free Lithuania.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, today, as we commemorate the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence, the freedom loving people of that gallant nation and others behind the Iron Curtain are no more free than last year when we marked this day of independence. The 3 million Lithuanians who look to America for leadership in their struggle to regain their independence look in vain—for our foreign policy takes us no closer to peace and the Lithuanian people no closer to freedom.

In Cleveland a large segment of the population is of Lithuanian extraction. They have made a valuable contribution to the civic life of our community. In their diligent work and provident thrift, in their respect for the Constitution and the laws of our community, they are exemplary citizens. They have always been proud of their culture and heritage. They have always been concerned with the welfare of their less fortunate families and friends who remained in Lithuania.

Their friends and neighbors in Cleveland are grateful for this tremendous contribution and they share their concern over families and loved ones left behind. On this day we reaffirm our pledge to Lithuanians and to all oppressed people that we shall not relent in our efforts to keep alive the spirit of true freedom and to achieve individual dignity for man everywhere.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, on this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day we pay homage to the courageous people of Lithuania, who have kept alive the flame of liberty despite two decades of subjugation and oppression. The Lithuania of the 20th century took its place among the nations on February 16, 1918, when the people proclaimed their independence.

For more than a century they had been occupied by Russia, and after World War I were able to announce the fruition of an age-old dream.

In a historical sense, Lithuania was born anew because it was a name old in the annals of Europe as far back as the 12th century. Lithuania was an entity when the hordes from the east which overran it were a nameless force; and during the Middle Ages it was a powerful state. It fell before the Russians in 1795, and many armies marched across its soil in succeeding years. In 1940, after 22 years of freedom, in which Lithuania contributed much to the culture and industry of the world, it was swallowed up by the Soviet Union. But the valiant people of this nation have kept alive their burning desire for freedom and independence and will continue their fight to become once again a free nation among other nations.

To this day the United States has refused to recognize the "de jure" absorption of Lithuania by the Soviet Union. Like other freedom-loving people the world over, we believe that every man and every country has a God-given right to liberty. We salute the inspiring example of resistance and determination shown by the Lithuanian people behind the Iron Curtain, and denounce the Soviet Union for its brutality and imperialism.

The soul of Lithuania lives today. It lives sadly in Europe beneath the yoke of the Soviet Union. It lives seriously in the hearts of its countrymen abroad, who see their motherland bent beneath the Communist yoke. And it lives proudly here in the United States where these brave, persevering, liberty-loving people have maintained their national characteristics and have contributed much and in many ways to the communities around them. It will continue to live and one day we fervently hope in the not too distant future Lithuania will be a free and independent nation again.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, 41 years ago this week, after a century and a quarter of imperial Russian domination, the freedom-loving people of Lithuania saw the dawn of a new day which they hoped and fervently believed would become a lasting era of independence for them. The tragic end of that freedom by the ruthless onslaughts of the Soviets is known to the entire world. The godless Red rule was even worse than the czarist yoke and the devout Lithuanian people prayed for deliverance from its terrors. In a year, almost to the day, Stalin was himself the victim of the treachery of his former partner-in-crime, Hitler, and Soviet domination in Lithuania came to an end. Any joy that the Lithuanian people had in being rid of the Soviet executioners and kidnapers was short lived when the true nature of the Nazi reign asserted itself. For more than 3 years these brave people suffered under another tyranny little different from what they had been enduring.

In midyear of 1944 the Red army again crossed the Lithuanian border. In the hypocritical jargon of the Red dictator, the Soviets were liberating Lithuania from the capitalist and Fascist exploiters. The whole world now knows the horrors of that kind of liberation.

These are historical facts that need no elaboration at this time and it is not my purpose to review them. I do, however, want to pay my tribute to the character of the brave Lithuanian people and to express the wish that a solution to their trials will soon be found. The hearts of all of us who enjoy the blessings of liberty go out to these courageous men and women who are today deprived of their cherished freedom. The Red tyrants have not a thing in common with these victims—neither religion, nor culture, nor language—and they will never absorb them into the maw of Soviet atheism by which every individual is demeaned and made subservient to the idolatry of the state. We in the United States must let the Lithuanian people know of our sympathy with their cause. We must do all we can by peaceful means to help them regain their long-pursued liberty. We pray that they will be sustained in their struggle.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I join with all my fellow Americans in commemorating the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian national independence, and take this occasion to extend my personal greetings to all of our fellow citizens of Lithuanian descent.

The case of Lithuania stands as a symbol of the right of every nation, large or small, to be free and independent. It also carries with it a great human story of a heroic people who struggled over the centuries for their independence—a struggle carried on by an entire nation against the Russian despots. The Lithuanian nation, after winning its independence, demonstrated its real friendship for the United States and its unfaltering allegiance to the same free institutions which we so cherish. We Americans have always been proud of the support we gave to the Lithuanian nation in its struggle against the Russians and in building their democratic way of life which characterized Lithuania during the period between the Great Wars.

There is an unbreakable bond between the United States and Lithuania which has been solidly forged upon the anvil of time and experience.

All men of good will are saddened by the plight of Lithuania today, as it stands occupied by the Russian despots. Lithuania has an alien government imposed by the Kremlin which has proclaimed its bitter enmity for the United States and our free way of life, but the Lithuanian people have kept faith with us in their determined adherence to the cause of human freedom—despite the terrible penalties they must continue to pay for that position.

Lithuania, like the other non-Russian nations occupied by the Kremlin, sees in the United States the last great hope for civilization. We as a Nation stand as a bright symbol to the certainty that Lithuania will once again be free and independent.

There are strange voices in the world today calling for a recognition of the status quo, a deal with the Russians whereby Russia would keep intact its vast empire of slavery in exchange for which we would be spared the Russian hatchet for a few fleeting, humiliating years.

The modern day Russian czar, Khrushchev, in a speech delivered from Minsk last year, stated that the only problem to be negotiated between the Russians and the free world was acceptance of a status quo. He stated in unmistakable words that unless the United States and our allies are prepared to accept this first condition, negotiation of such other problems as there might be would not be considered by the Russians. In other words Khrushchev told the world that the Russians were prepared to grant a temporary peace if the free world would recognize the present day Russian empire and undertake a nonaggression pact which would announce to the world that all the people behind the Iron Curtain were doomed to everlasting slavery.

But the voice of Khrushchev is not the only voice being heard in the world advocating this proposal. The misguided and naive George Kennan, who has been posed as a Russian expert, is the spokesman in the free world for this plan of silent surrender. But there are other such voices, most fearing to speak out publicly, but nevertheless actively working behind the scenes for this sellout. With each passing day the devious effort to force the U.S. Government into recognition of the status quo takes on added intensity. This maneuver does violence to the hopes and aspirations of all the American people. The American people do not seek a few, fleeting and humiliating years during which they cringe awaiting the final death blow from the Russians to our free way of life. But these voices, alien to the United States and the wishes of the American people, are gaining strength in the high councils of the Government.

There is greater need today than ever before in our history for the American people to be vigilant in the defense of our individual liberties and the advocacy of the right of every nation to be free and independent. We know that the best guarantee for our own liberty and safety is a world in which every nation is free and all empires are dissolved.

On this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian national independence, I urge that the foreign policy of the United States be brought under critical review by the American people. In this respect the Congress of the United States can and will perform its part. The American people will, in the end, however, determine how soon we will drive these strange voices advocating a silent surrender to the Russians out into the open where they can be properly dealt with. I shall continue to do all I possibly can to hasten the day when Lithuania will be restored to its independence and its rightful position among the nations of the world.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my comments to those of other Members of the House who today, with the multitude of Americans of Lithuanian descent and, indeed, with freedom-loving people everywhere, observe the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence.

On February 16, 1918, Lithuania proclaimed her independence, after scores of years of Russian domination. Lithuania embarked on the course of progress. She made great strides forward—in land reform, education, commerce, agriculture and industry. This progress under freedom was ended 19 years ago when the Soviet Union forcibly annexed this brave nation, imposing a brutal rule that unfortunately has continued.

We are certain, however, that the spark of freedom has not been extinguished among Lithuanians. The independence of Lithuania as a nation may have been short lived, but the love of liberty is undying, as the masters of the Soviet Union have surely discovered in their efforts to enslave the Lithuanian people.

To these brave men and women, we extend our friendship, our sympathy, and our prayers that the day soon will dawn when Lithuania again takes her rightful place among the free nations of the world.

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, the 41st anniversary of the Lithuanian declaration of independence is being observed today. I am pleased to join with my colleagues and the many friends of Lithuania in commemorating this day of independence, for the peoples of Lithuania, now subjected to the tyrannical rule of Soviet Russia, are prohibited from observing it. Our sympathy is extended to the many Lithuanian Americans who deplore the enslavement under which their kinfolk in Lithuania must live and whose hearts must ever be filled with anxiety for those in the homeland.

The people of Lithuania, who fought so long and bravely for their independence, finally achieved it in 1918. Their progress in all fields of their endeavors and their fine achievements were outstanding; during the short period of their independence, the people earned the admiration of democratic peoples everywhere for their ideals, industry, and high resolve. After the short period of 22 years, their independence was crushed and their country was again brought under Russian rule.

We salute the brave people of Lithuania and extend the hand of friendship to them. As the cause of Lithuania is just and righteous, as she is entitled to her freedom, we hope and pray for the day when her independence will be restored to her.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today, February 16, marks the 41st anniversary of the proclamation of independence by Lithuania. The people of Lithuania prevailed over the Soviet Communists in 1918 but are again engaged in a struggle with the Communists for their freedom and independence. Since 1940, when the Soviet Union forcefully occupied and illegally annexed Lithuania and her sister Baltic States of Estonia and Latvia, the Lithuanian people have been subjected to cruel and ruthless treatment at the hands of the Communists. Thousands of Lithuanians have been deported to Siberia or murdered under the Soviet plan of Russification of the Lithuanian Nation.

Lithuanians behind the Iron Curtain have been fighting the evils of Communist aggression and suppression for 19 years now. In spite of the apparent hopelessness of their present position, the Lithuanian people have not lost heart and given up their struggle for freedom. These valiant people deserve the highest praise for their perseverance and determination. The example of their survival in the face of such ruthless foreign domination will remain an inspiration to future generations.

America has shown she is interested in the plight of the Lithuanians and other captive peoples behind the Iron Curtain. The U.S. Government has never recognized the incorporation of Lithuania, Estonia, or Latvia by the Soviet Union as legal. The American people will never cease to hope and pray for the deliverance of the Lithuanians from their Communist aggressors.

America can help to keep alive the hopes of the Lithuanian people by continuing to show our interest and sympathy with their cause. We should publicize the truth about Lithuania and extend to these people all the encouragement we can.

The Lithuanian Nation will not be destroyed so long as the Lithuanian people can preserve their hopes for eventual freedom and independence. With our support the Lithuanians can and will survive this terrible ordeal as they have survived other periods of Russian domination in the past. They have a heritage of prosperity and progress as an independent republic and a history as a nation dating back to the 13th century, of which they are justly proud. Such people, in whom the fires of freedom and justice burn brightly, are not easily defeated.

We have a common cause—to hold back the Communists. We all know that the Communist goals are to destroy the free world and with it the personal and economic freedoms of all people. In order to prevent this, the free peoples of the world must unite with the Lithuanians to destroy the scourge of communism. If the free world remains resolute and vigilant, we will prevail.

The time will come when the Communist regime in Lithuania and the other Baltic States which is based on force and lies will collapse. Then Lithuania can reestablish herself as a prosperous free nation.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, 41 years ago Lithuania, a little land on the Baltic Sea, overthrew a Czarist reign that had oppressed its people for more than 100 years. For two exciting decades the independent republic thrived and became a respected nation among nations.

Then, when the storm clouds of World War II shattered over Europe, Lithuania was again engulfed by the oppressor from the east, who this time was bigger, godless, and more ruthless than the czars. Lithuania was but one of a number of Baltic and East European states that were forcibly annexed by the Soviet Union.

We take this occasion, the 41st anniversary of the restoration of independence, to protest the Soviet seizure in the name of free mankind. We hold it to be self-evident that free democracies make free men, and, since our Declaration of Independence, we have held that the condition of freedom is and always shall be an inalienable right of men everywhere.

May the fate of Lithuania and her Baltic neighbors serve, at the very least, to remind the people of Africa, the Middle East, Asia, and the Americas of the nature of Soviet imperialism, and may we be warned that behind its cape of professed friendship is hidden a steel blade.

I congratulate the Lithuanian American Information Center and its ceaseless campaign for liberty, an affirmation, indeed, of the fact that a people's spirit cannot be crushed by the weight of tyrannical rule. With all Lithuanian-Americans, and those Lithuanians who endure silently behind the Red flag, let us hope and pray that someday their right of self-determination will be restored.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, each year—there are 41 of them now—some of us pause to remember this day.

The commemoration of any national independence holiday is a bittersweet thing. For us in America the 4th of July is a time of heat, fireworks, ice cream, and speeches. We look back on our forefathers' struggles in 1776 with nostalgia, pride, and a certain degree of contentment. While our span of history is short in comparison with that of Europe, we have thrived, expanded, and grown in world stature and responsibility. These accomplishments have been made possible because of our sovereign independent freedom.

Freedom is first a state of mind. From that state of mind is made possible the dynamics of responsible action. Whenever man's state of mind is limited by an outside force the inevitable corrollary is a limitation of his action. He no longer is a wholly responsible being.

This day, February 16, 1959, marks the 41st anniversary of a people who have spent the majority of contemporary history as living examples of overt foreign domination. The Lithuanian people have been deprived of their birthright. For only two score years—between the two world wars—have the Lithuanians known freedom. Yet, the significance of these twenty odd years makes present Soviet domination historically transitory. The idea of freedom is a potent thing, the reality of the idea is even stronger; but, when the reality is vanquished by force and brutality, the will of any subject people is unbreakable. Those of Lithuanian stock throughout the United States know that this is true. You gentlemen in this room know that this is true. In their deepest inner knowledge the leaders of the Soviet Union know this is true.

It is in recognition of the symbolic meaning of this day that I am glad to salute the Lithuanian people on the anniversary of their independence. May the fulfillment of freedom that lives in their hearts be theirs once again.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, on today citizens of Lithuanian descent throughout the country are commemorating the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence—a historic event in the world struggle for freedom and justice. This day reminds us once more of the heroism of the people of Lithuania and her neighboring countries of Latvia and Estonia, and their courageous efforts and determination to keep up their fight for their national independence.

The people of Lithuania who have made their homes in this country have made notable contributions to America. The present circumstances in their former homeland are of grave concern to Lithuanian Americans, and to all Americans. The United States has always deplored the Soviet exploitation of Lithuania and other Baltic countries. I am glad to join with other Members of the U.S. Congress today in paying homage and honor to the victims of Soviet aggression in Lithuania, and in protest of the continuation of Soviet occupation and tyranny.

I wish to include in my remarks the following excerpts from a letter received from Mary M. Kizis, director of the Lithuanian American Information Center in New York City:

Lithuanian Americans are planning commemorative services in New York City on Sunday, February 15, under the auspices of the Lithuanian American Council of Greater New York. This observance will be commemorated the world over; in practically every State in the Union. It is a forbidden holiday in Lithuania. Lithuania, as you know, was not a new state after World War I; her recorded history began in the 11th century. During the years of independence, from 1918 to 1940 (when she was forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union), Lithuania's progress in all spheres of endeavor was remarkable. She earned the right to take her place in the family of free nations. The present situation in Lithuania is of grave concern to Lithuanian Americans, the majority of whom have kinfolk in the old country. Few people are permitted to leave the country and no visitors are allowed. Lithuanians still look to the United States with hope. Lithuanian Americans are grateful to the United States for never having recognized the illegal annexation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union. They are grateful for broadcasts to Lithuania over the Voice of America in the Lithuanian language.

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, today should be a day of joyous celebration for Lithuanians everywhere, for it is the 41st anniversary of the proclamation of independence by the people of that courageous nation.

Unfortunately, it is not a day for joy but one of sad commemoration because of the communistic tyrants who rule Soviet Russia.

It was with great hope that Lithuania proclaimed its independence on February 16, 1918, to end 123 years of servitude to Imperialistic Russian rule. It was then that the light of liberty was rekindled in Lithuania. The Lithuanian people were free. They could now bring about the realization of their dreams, hopes, and ambitions.

But freedom for Lithuania was short lived. On the dark day of June 15, 1940, the Soviet Russian Army marched into Lithuania, bringing a new Russian imperialism and Communist tyranny to the struggling nation. It was a black day in the history of the world.

The Soviet Russian action was in complete violation of all treaties, including its own mutual assistance pact with Lithuania that guaranteed Lithuanian independence and of Russian noninterference in the domestic, social, and economic order of that nation.

How typical of the warlords of the Kremlin. Treaties, pacts, and agreements mean nothing to them. The seizure of Lithuania should forever be a lesson to the world of the intent and purposes of the Communist forces of Soviet Russia. It is a lesson that we here in the Halls of the Congress should not forget as we join Lithuanians everywhere in the solemn commemoration of the 41st anniversary of their declaration of independence.

Although their nation was treacherously seized and its people have been subjected to all types of brutality by the Russian Communists, the Lithuanians' love for liberty has not died. They wait patiently and with determination for the day when they will be free again; when again Lithuania will be able to take her place with the free nations of the world.

On this solemn day, may we all join in extending our deepest sympathy and friendship to these brave people, who had made such magnificent strides as a free nation. May we also join in prayer with these courageous people that the day of deliverance for Lithuania soon will be realized and that the light of freedom will glow once more over their land.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, we who represent the American people in the Congress of the United States are privileged once again to commemorate the gallant and unceasing struggle for freedom which has been waged for 41 years by a brave people in a tiny land in Eastern Europe.

Forty-one years ago, the people of Lithuania declared their independence and established a new government on the shores of the Baltic Sea.

For the next 22 years, Lithuanians struggled to retain and strengthen their freedom—and struggled successfully.

Then, in June of 1940, the armies of Soviet Russia—in crass and open violation of international law and of the rights of man—invaded Lithuania and subjected its people to as brutal a tyranny as the world has seen in many generations.

That tyrannous and unjust rule has continued to this day, but the people of Lithuania have never given up their love of freedom and their courageous fight to reestablish it once again.

Here in the United States, their sons and daughters, brothers and sisters, have helped to keep strong the hopes of Lithuanian freedom. As one who is privileged to represent a district in which many Americans of Lithuanian descent now reside, I have watched with pride their enduring devotion to this great cause.

It is very much in the American tradition to value freedom so greatly as to fight for it and, if necessary, die for it. The dedication of so many Lithuanian-Americans to freedom—not only for their homeland but for others wherever it has been threatened—may help explain the great contribution they have made to their adopted land as American citizens.

Their fellow Americans—from all the lands of the earth—are proud to join with them today in commemorating the struggle we shall endlessly pursue until victory is ours: independence for Lithuania, and peace and freedom throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker, as the New York Times said today, "In the Baltic countries the path to a better future is still dark, but it is not lost and will not be. The day of the overlords will not last forever."

In this same spirit, Mr. Speaker, I include resolutions unanimously adopted by Lithuanian-Americans of Linden, N.J. at this point in my remarks as a testament to the hopes of all Americans who love freedom.

RESOLUTIONS UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED ON FEBRUARY 8, 1959, BY THE LITHUANIAN AMERICANS OF LINDEN, N.J., GATHERED UNDER AUSPICES OF LITHUANIAN AMERICAN COUNCIL, LINDEN BRANCH, FOR COMMEMORATION OF THE 41ST ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF LITHUANIA'S INDEPENDENCE

Whereas on February 16, 1918, Lithuania was formally declared a free and independent state by the Council of Lithuania in Vilnius; and

Whereas Americans of Lithuanian origin, commemorating this year the 41st anniversary of the establishment of a free and independent Lithuania, strive to actuate the fact, that the years of independent government fully proved and justified the nation's integrity for self-government and completely warranted credence and recognition as a free and independent state, accorded her by the other world nations; and

Whereas the Americans of Lithuanian descent hope that Lithuania, presently occupied by the Communist Soviets, will again regain the rights of freedom and liberty as a sovereign nation; and

Whereas now, more than ever, it has been proven that no one nation's security is assured of the ominous threat of a dictatorial communism, lately bolstered by scientific progression to be utilized for further harassment of world peace: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, Americans of Lithuanian descent, are determined and united to uphold the efforts of the Lithuanian people to regain their independence and liberation; and

Resolved, That the Government of the United States approve or indorse no agreement which would in any manner accede to the outgrowth of any past, present, or future Soviet aggressive action; and

Resolved, That we declare, as in the past, our appreciation of the United States policy of non-recognition of the incorporation by force of Lithuania into the Soviet Union; and

Resolved, That it is our hope, that the representatives of our Government will firmly maintain this policy at any future deliberations regarding the status of enslaved nations; and

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, His Excellency Dwight D. Eisenhower; to the Secretary of State, the Honorable John Foster Dulles; to the U.S. permanent representative to the United Nations, the Honorable Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr.; to the U.S. Senators of New Jersey, the Honorable Harrison A. Williams and the Honorable Clifford P. Case; and to the Representative of the Sixth Congressional District of New Jersey, the Honorable Florence P. Dwyer.

JOHN LIUDVINAITIS,
President.

VLADAS TURSA,
Secretary.

LINDEN, N.J., February 8, 1959.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, Lithuanian Independence Day is significant to all peoples everywhere who are actively seeking a solution to the contemporary ideological and political struggles current in the world. From a proud, ancient and independent past, first recorded by the Roman historian Tacitus, the Lithuanian people have been forced to continually fight for national survival. Today, Lithuanians look back over the last five centuries and see 22 years of complete freedom. Twenty-two years of liberty in 5 centuries is a very short length of time, gentlemen.

However, even after being dominated by first Poland, then Russia, Germany and now Russia once again, the Lithuanian people have never lost faith in their guiding principles of democracy and liberty. The sands of history have not been kind. For only a few short years after World War I did the Lithuanian people have their independence. This was made possible by the dissolution of Czarist Russia and the realization of President Wilson's 14 points. What joy these people must have known.

And then the destruction of it all: The Red army—the swiftness of Hitler's legions and now the Red army once again. The Lithuanian people are completely isolated; their only contact with the rest of the world is through the memory of their friends and loved ones who live in the citadel of the West.

The United States has continued to recognize the free Lithuanian Republic and has deprecated the Soviet conquest. The government now controlling the destiny of the Lithuanian people is not the government of the people; it is the government of tyranny, of barbarism and brutality. No nation can forever maintain control by terror. History bears this truth.

Now, until some future time when the Lithuanian people can lift their heads and hearts in freedom once more, it is the duty, and my honor, for all free men everywhere to take a moment and pay tribute to the spirit of the Lithuanian people. It is the same spirit upon which America and the whole of the Western tradition is built—the spirit of independence, human dignity, and progress. This spirit is contingent upon one thing: freedom.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, today, February 16, we commemorate the 41st anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of the Republic of Lithuania. On this occasion we pay tribute to a people who with tenacity and innate national vitality have clung to the best, and advanced the cultural traditions of the West and whose fight for freedom has continued despite every obstacle and discouragement.

In paying tribute to Lithuania, and its people, and in commemorating the anniversary of its independence we must take this opportunity to remind ourselves, the free world, yes, and those who consider themselves neutrals, of certain facts, which amid pressing international events we might forget:

First. February 16, 1918, the restoration of the independence of Lithuania was declared by the council of Lithuania at Vilnius.

Second. By treaty of peace of July 12, 1920, Soviet Russia recognized Lithuania as a fully self-governing and completely independent state.

Third. By the nonaggression pact of September 28, 1926, the Soviet Union agreed to respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity, and inviolability of Lithuania under all circumstances.

Fourth. In total disregard of these treaties of peace and nonaggression, the Soviet Union seized and illegally incorporated Lithuania into the empire of the Soviet Union.

Fifth. These acts of aggression committed by the Soviet Union are in direct violation of international law, the Atlantic Charter, the Declaration and Charter of the United Nations all of which were signed by the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and other nations. In their diatribes against the United States the Soviets have used the term "imperialist" and claim for themselves the role of liberators of oppressed peoples.

I call upon you my colleagues and through you the freedom-loving countries of the world to look into the record of Soviet relations with Lithuania to evaluate that record in terms of the appellation "liberators of oppressed peoples." These actions of the U.S.S.R. in violation of the treaties they have signed all are a matter of record.

Lithuania began her existence as a powerful and independent state during the Middle Ages and reached the height of her power after the Battle of Tannenberg—1410. Besides checking the eastward drive of the Teutonic Knights, Lithuania protected Europe from the Mongols and the Tartars. Thus by the beginning of the 15th century, she had become a formidable East European power with territories stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea, even embracing White Russia and the Ukraine.

Recognition of human freedom, education, and toleration marked the Lithuanian Government during this period of its power; and it played an important part in the general development of European civilization during this time.

Decline came with the 18th century and the growth of the power of the czars. Lithuania, although dominated by Russia refused to bow her head to the Russian yoke and in revolt after revolt attempted to strike for freedom. Consequences were severe. In 1831 the University of Vilna was closed as were schools and monasteries. The Czar Nicholas I set out upon a program of suppression of Lithuanian culture. Use of the language was forbidden, the Catholic religion was proscribed. Suppression, hangings, exile to Siberia failed to still love of freedom and independence in the Lithuanian heart.

World War I furnished Lithuanian leaders with the opportunity for which generations of freedom fighters had been waiting. Although war had devastated and impoverished the country, the independence of Lithuania was proclaimed February 16, 1918 at Vilnius. The treaty of peace, July 12, 1920, recognized Lithuania as an independent state.

During two decades of independent existence the country grew and prospered. Under an independent government the domestic economy grew and was diversified: foreign trade expanded, social services never before dreamed of were instituted. Education which had been impeded during the Russian regime was made compulsory. Besides 2,560 elementary schools attended by 292,000 pupils, the government of the republic opened special schools for the study of agriculture—the chief industry of the country.

With World War II came the end of Lithuania as a country dedicated to the general welfare. It was cold-bloodedly incorporated into the Soviet Union in an act of aggression devoid of legal foundation or moral justification.

The Acting Secretary of State put the United States on record July 23, 1940, in the following statement:

> During the past few days the devious processes whereunder the political independence and territorial integrity of the three small Baltic Republics—Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania—were to be deliberately annihilated by one of their more powerful neighbors, has been rapidly drawing to their conclusion.
> From the day when the people of these Republics first gained their independence and democratic form of government, the people of the United States have watched their admirable progress in self-government with deep and sympathetic interest.
> The people of the United States are opposed to predatory activities no matter whether they are carried on by the use of force or the threat of force. They are likewise opposed to any form of intervention on the part of one state however powerful in the domestic affairs of any other state, however weak.

The balance of the dreary events have been told in this Chamber many times. I shall spare you repetition. Suffice it to say the self-styled liberator of oppressed peoples has followed a policy of extermination against Lithuania through mass deportations, slave labor, biological extermination, and complete destruction of cultural values.

Were it not for the unconquerable spirit of the people of Lithuania, both those who languish under Soviet rule and those who have escaped to other lands, celebration of this 41st anniversary of their independence might be tinged with bitter irony. But just as they have kept their ancient lore alive in their beautiful language, so freedom and independence flourish in their hearts. Therein lies the promise that one day Lithuania shall gain her freedom.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, on this date, February 16, 1959, the 41st anniversary of the declaration of independence of Lithuania is being observed by the peoples of Lithuania, their relatives, and friends of this heroic nation. We commemorate this occasion with the fervent hope and certainty that Lithuania will again be a free and independent land of opportunity and proud of its heritage.

We realize, from the very nature of our own history, which parallels that of Lithuania, that independence is not a gift and does not come easily. The Lithuanian story is one of outstanding heroism, which eventually led to her independence. During the space of two decades of liberty, Lithuanian progress and achievement in the field of agriculture, education, and industry proved worthy of worldwide respect and honor. This resulted in an unusually high standard of living for the strenuous efforts made toward the freedom we all cherish.

Lithuania is the largest of the Baltic States, and her people are known for their courage and friendliness. The return to independence and freedom is her right. Her people merit peace, opportunity, and safety within her own national boundaries.

The millions of loyal Americans, relatives and friends of the Lithuanian people, are helping to keep the hope of liberty and independence alive. The observance of this day will add a ray of hope toward the day when Lithuania will again take her rightful place in the family of nations in a free world.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join many of my colleagues in marking this 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence.

Despite the tramp of the Soviet military boot which has echoed over Lithuania since 1939, the people of Lithuania, and of the other nations now ruled by Russia through force, live with hope and memory. Their hope is for the day when they and their children will have a second Lithuanian Independence Day to mark the day when the Soviet rule will be thrown off. Their memory is of the years of freedom from this day 41 years ago until the black day in 1939 when the Russians moved in to rule with steel.

I join my colleagues in sending greetings to the people of Lithuania wherever they are on this memorable anniversary. May their ideals and memories stay alive, may their courage and hope never fail them. If there is right in this world, the people of Lithuania will someday be able to know freedom and independence again.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the House the fact that today, February 16, is Lithuania Independence Day. But the plain fact is that this day, first celebrated 41 years ago, serves to remind us that Lithuania is no longer free to celebrate this proud day in its history.

The vast majority of freedom-loving American people, I am confident, join with me in a sincere hope that some day the efforts of the free world may result in bringing Lithuania and other freedom-loving countries out from behind the Iron Curtain.

The people of Lithuania have my profound sympathy, and I am sure efforts will continue to be made to bring about the freedom of Lithuania which the people of that country so ardently desire.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, in commemoration of the 41st anniversary of the Lithuanian independence proclamation, I, under unanimous consent, insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my recent remarks to the Lithuanian American Council, Inc.

The coming 41st anniversary of the restoration of the independence of Lithuania on Monday, February 16, gives me this welcome opportunity to express my most sincere hopes for a renewal of that freedom that Lithuania experienced for the 22 years following 1918. Americans have not ceased to be horrified and angered by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics' forcible termination of Lithuanian independence in 1940, and will never recognize that attempt to subjugate a people who have historically demonstrated their love of freedom and their ability to flourish under a free system.

Yet, I know that the Soviet Union's blatant violation of the Law of Nations has not accomplished its purpose, in spite of the annexation of Lithuanian territory, for the Lithuanian peoples have demonstrated that they will not be enslaved in spirit. Their determined search for the support of the Western democracies, their continued listening to the Voice of America, and the very existence of your organization prove that in Lithuania are peoples of courage, fortitude, and devotion to belief in the dignity of man and the inherent value of free institutions.

Although the people of Lithuania in their own country are forbidden to celebrate the anniversary of the restoration, I join my fellow Americans in remembrance of that day to wish for renewed Lithuanian freedom, to admire Lithuanian fortitude, and to praise the devoted work of the Lithuanian American Council, Inc.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the unfortunate Lithuanians are among the most stout-hearted and bravest fighters for liberty and freedom. Yet, freedom and independence have been denied to them for centuries.

Except for the short but happy interlude of interwar years, they have had the misfortune to suffer under the oppressive and at times almost unbearable alien yoke in their homeland for almost two centuries. During the First World War, it seemed that their woes had come to an end by the overthrow of the Czarist Russian regime, when they regained their freedom by proclaiming their national independence on February 16, in 1918. For about two decades fate was kind to them, and they lived happily in their free country. But, as the clouds of war began to gather over Eastern Europe in 1939, their situation became extremely precarious, and early in the war their independence was shattered by the forces of the Red army.

Since then the unhappy Lithuanians have not known freedom, and have been held down by their Communist overlords. In their own country they lead the lives of prisoners in a vast prison camp, working as long as humanly possible, and under most wretched conditions, for their masters in the Kremlin. There is no trace of freedom, neither of speech, nor of movement, nor of correspondence; not even the freedom to lead a quiet life in any corner of the country.

But they have the satisfaction of knowing that they have friends and sympathizers in the free world, and particularly in America.

Today on the 41st anniversary celebration of the independence day I gladly join hosts of Americans of Lithuanian descent and echo their true liberty-loving sentiments.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the roots of American strength and greatness have been the diversity of its population. It has been the transfusion of foreign cultures into the circulation of American life that makes our country what it is today. The reasons for immigration to our shores have been varied, but the most tragic of these has been the loss of freedom in the homeland. This was the case in Lithuania.

In the latter part of the 18th century, when Russia absorbed Lithuania, many oppressed Lithuanians, finding freedom and justice more precious than the ties of their native soil, fled to our free shores.

Once in this country, these brave Lithuanians never ceased in their struggle to achieve liberty for their persecuted homeland. Numerous Lithuanian organizations throughout the United States worked vigorously for Lithuanian freedom. This work was not to be in vain, for on February 16, 1918, independence was finally realized. Happily, many Lithuanians returned home, but many more decided to remain in their adopted country.

Lithuania's loss was to be America's gain. Despite the strangeness of our laws, customs, and language, these eager Lithuanians quickly adjusted to the American way of life. Although naturally concerned about the fate of their homeland, these people identified themselves completely with America. They became solid American citizens and have never ceased to be grateful for the opportunities that this country has provided.

On the other hand, Americans have been equally grateful for the contributions of these Lithuanians to the growth of their culture. Evidence of these contributions is shown by the success of Lithuanian-Americans in various fields of endeavor.

The list of their achievements is long. Such names as Mikas Petraukas, Shirley White, and Ivan Lebedeff are familiar to music and theater lovers. Sport fans have cheered Jack Sharkey, Jack Goodman, and Vito Tamulis. In addition many more have served faithfully in public offices throughout the United States.

These few examples are indicative of the Lithuanian-American contributions to American life.

Nevertheless, although Americans first, these American citizens have a natural concern for the land of their ancestors which once again is not free. Ever since 1940, this helpless country has been incorporated into the Soviet Union. Although today is the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence, Lithuanian-American hearts are sad, for today will not be one for rejoicing in the land of their forebears.

Consequently, I would like to take this opportunity, on the anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, to express with all Lithuanian-Americans their hope of freedom for their oppressed homeland. Moreover, all the free world should resolve on this February 16 to work unceasingly for conditions that will bring peace to the world, allowing all nations to live in an environment of self-government, peace, and justice.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, just a few short weeks ago it was my privilege to participate in the observance of the 41st anniversary of Urkainian freedom.

What I said then can be mirrored today in our commemoration of the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence.

Before the outbreak of World War II, Lithuania, along with her sister Baltic nations, Estonia and Latvia, was still an independent and democratic state.

But in June 1940 the cherished freedom of Lithuania evaporated with the cruel and unjust seizure of the country by Soviet Russia.

Within 2 days Soviet military troops invaded and tramped through the territory of Lithuania, as well as of Estonia and Latvia.

Lithuania has not been free since that time, but the spirit of freedom, hidden though it is behind the Iron Curtain, remains alive in the hearts and minds of Lithuanians.

Always a proud, virile nation which, through its long history, survived other oppressions, we of free America have little doubt that Lithuania will survive her present persecution and tyranny.

Ruling Lithuania, just as in other Soviet satellite nations, is a detested puppet regime that has stolen from the Lithuanian people all of their political and social rights and has forced them to vote for a single list of candidates designated by the Communist Party.

The people of Lithuania live in constant fear and terror. Their personal security is nonexistent. They are harassed every minute of every day by the agents of the secret police.

Without reason, without fair trials, they are imprisoned, investigated, executed, or deported for slave labor to remote areas of the Soviet Union.

Seven major waves of mass deportations, carried out under inhuman conditions, have diminished the total population of Lithuania by more than 350,000. Lithuania, a predominantly Roman Catholic population, has also seen her priests murdered, jailed, deported, or exiled. Of nearly 2,000 priests, we are told less than 750 remain free and alive.

Monasteries have been closed. Church property has been confiscated. Religious instruction has been forbidden.

What, then, keeps the faint, flickering hopes of the oppressed Lithuanian people alive?

What gives these gallant people the strength to sustain a persecution and a tyranny the like of which the world has not seen for centuries?

Two things, Mr. Speaker, just two things—an unrelenting faith in God and an indomitable courage born of tremendous hope.

And one day, I am confident, this great faith, this fantastic courage will be rewarded, and Lithuania will be delivered from enslavement, as will all the other oppressed peoples under the yoke of Soviet tyranny.

Mr. PILLION. Mr. Speaker, it is a distinct privilege for me to add my small voice to the growing demands for freedom on the part of millions of Lithuanians and other nationalistic groups who are being kept in a captive status under the Soviet Communist rule.

Although, Premier Nikita Khrushchev continues to boast of the military strength and the economic advances of the Soviet, he fails to recognize that this apparent strength is based upon a compulsive labor economy that is held together by fear, by military tanks and guns, and by the cloak, spy, and dagger machinations of the select Communist Party membership and leadership.

I am sure that the spirit and the desire for freedom on the part of the Lithuanian people cannot be quenched and will continue to grow. The nationalistic spirit and the desire for freedom on the part of millions of people under the domination of the Soviet Socialist Republics will continue to be a fatal weakness in the miscalculations of Mr. Khrushchev and his Politburo Bureau.

I join with the Lithuanian American Council in today's celebration of the 41st anniversary of the restoration of independence of Lithuania. I join with the millions of Americans of Lithuanian extraction in their aspirations for the liberation of the Lithuanian Nation.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 41st anniversary of the Lithuanian declaration of independence. Because of the many folks of Lithuanian descent in my Third District of Ohio, I feel that it is especially fitting to call attention to this day in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In 1918 our country rejoiced with the Lithuanian people when they became a free nation. By decree in 1940 Soviet Russia cut short this independence by absorbing this little, freedom-loving nation. Nevertheless, this act of tyranny could not stamp out the steadily-burning flame of liberty which lives in the Lithuanian people.

We as citizens of a free, democratic nation join with these people and with those of Lithuanian descent in the United States in the fervent hope and prayer that freedom will one day be restored to this long-suffering nation.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, today is an anniversary—the anniversary of Lithuanian independence. We in the United States have never known the haunting fear of having our independence physically threatened, let alone the reality of foreign occupation. We can speak of the plight and the bravery of the Lithuanian people, but for most of us we understand their plight only through our imagination. But, nevertheless, here are people—almost 3 million people—that are realistic symbols of man's inhumanity to his fellow man.

The significance of Lithuania to those of us of Western culture is this: From a glorious and ancient past in which the Duchy of Lithuania stretched from the Baltic to the Black Sea the Lithuanian people have again and again been bled by richer and more powerful neighbors. From 1385 until the end of the 18th century Lithuania was part of Poland; then when Poland was annexed by Czarist Russia in 1795 Lithuania shared the same fate. Finally, in 1918, taking dual advantage of President Wilson's 14 points and the Russian revolution, the Lithuanian people declared their independence. This was their first taste of freedom since the 14th century; it lasted 22 years. In June 1940 Soviet troops took over the country. Then almost immediately the land was overrun by the German Army. German occupation lasted from 1941 until 1944, when it was displaced once again by the death grip of the Russian Bear.

I give this thumbnail sketch of the woes of Lithuania not to prove that history can be cruel but, rather, to point a meaningful moral. The Lithuanian people have been relentlessly submerged by force. They are now the unwilling victims of a political religion that seeks converts by every means known. The people of Lithuania in their present political dilemma represent the very thing that America fights against in word and in deed the world over. As such, we honor the people of Lithuania and their friends, relatives, and countrymen that live in the United States as men who have upheld the tenets of Western political culture. These men and women believe in the highest ideals of freedom, justice, and right. They have not been corrupted by Russian words but have seen and felt the sword of social and political tyranny beneath the phrases.

On this anniversary of Lithuanian independence I am proud to be one of those Americans commemorating this day in hopes that Lithuanian independence will soon be the reality that so many have fought, died, and lived for.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday was the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence. I consider it an honor and a duty to record my congratulations to the people of Lithuania, whose determination to achieve independence has set an example for all free people. Now, once again, despite the most ruthless suppression at home, Lithuanians everywhere keep alive the embers of liberty. The Soviet efforts to extinguish Lithuania's national identity are a sufficient answer to any who would relax our vigilance or our resistance to further efforts of Soviet expansion. Ultimately Lithuania's determination to regain independence must win out.

Mrs. WEIS. Mr. Speaker, I returned from Rochester, Sunday, to find 3 feet of water in my basement, and, yesterday, while others were paying tribute to the courageous people of Lithuania on the 41st anniversary of their independence, I was wading, barefoot, through my basement, in rather frantic pursuit of a number of trunks and footlockers which were floating about.

However, I do want to join with my colleagues in wishing Godspeed to the people of Lithuania in the fulfillment of their dream of once again, someday, breathing the fresh air of liberty and democratic self-government.

For century after century, Lithuania has been subjected to conquest—by Teutonic knights, Tartars, Russian czars, Nazis, and now, since 1940, by the Red terror which rules the Kremlin. From East and West alike, the power hungry of Europe have trampled back and forth across the face of this tiny nation with almost sickening regularity, pillaging and plundering, terrorizing and murdering as only ruthless barbarians are able. Yet, all of the bloodshed and brutality which has been the recurring fate of the people of Lithuania, has not, for all of its physical violence, been able to destroy the will to freedom and independence which has become their hallmark.

Forty-one years ago, at the height of the Russian revolution, Lithuania declared her independence from the disintegrating Russian Empire, and for a little over two decades she struggled to maintain her status as a free, democratic nation. But from the very beginning her existence was a terrifyingly precarious one, for she was wedged squarely between two growing young totalitarian giants, Soviet Russia and Nazi Germany, and both were waiting only for that moment when the fortunes of history would present one of them with a chance to again engulf this little nation. The brief alliance between Stalin and Hitler gave the Soviets the opportunity for which they had been waiting, and by the summer of 1940, Lithuania was once more in the iron grip of the Kremlin.

Almost 19 years have now passed since that fateful summer, and virtually every device known to the twisted despotic mind has been employed in an attempt to destroy the passion for freedom, the deep-rooted national consciousness, and the religious fervor of the people of Lithuania. But love of God, of country, and of liberty continues to burn as brightly as ever in the hearts and minds of Lithuanians everywhere—proof positive that such inborn yearnings will never be extinguished by the godless brutes of this or any other generation.

As they celebrate the 41st anniversary of their independence, I salute the brave and wonderful people of Lithuania, and I join with them in their prayers for a better, more peaceful world tomorrow.

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, the Communist leaders of the Kremlin are using and will continue to use every diabolical means and method to capture the nations of the free world. These Communist leaders seek to destroy the free world by the method of divide and conquer. During this critical period in history the peoples of the free world must remain alert to the intrigue of the Communist masters in the Kremlin. The free world is forced to remain strong militarily, economically, and spiritually. It is paramount that we act as one—in unison. It is paramount that we stand firm in our commitments to one another. It is paramount that the free world agree on every issue and, last but not least, that we maintain our faith in the Almighty. Only then can we avoid the pitfall of being engulfed into the orbit of the Communist fold. Let us recall the fate of those peoples and nations who are now the captives of the U.S.S.R.—Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria, Albania, Eastern Germany, not to mention those on the threshold of enslavement.

None of these nations have lost their craving for liberty. It is important to them that we rekindle their hope for freedom and help them maintain their morale. Therefore, on this February 16 Lithuania commemorates the day of its independence and the day of its national birthday. I join with the Lithuanians on this sad occasion and pray that the future holds for them the day of their liberation to which we in the free world rededicate ourselves.

Mr. PROKOP. Mr. Speaker, I am happy indeed to join in this observance of the 41st anniversary of the independence of Lithuania. This small nation—whose sons and daughters have contributed so much to the building of America—is, of course, not independent and free today.

Lithuania is a race of character, courage, and culture.

America is indeed grateful for the contributions that men and women of Lithuanian blood have made to our common strength.

They have a faith that the Soviets cannot destroy.

They have courage that the Soviets can never vanquish.

Lithuania has a character that will survive when all the fraud and force of godless tyrants will have vanished from the face of the earth.

This annual commemoration of her independence which was gained more than 41 years ago serves a most useful purpose. It is a reminder of the tragic fate of Lithuania and other countries that were formerly free but today are fettered by the chains of Communist slavery.

But this occasion is far more than a time for tribulation and sorrow over the fate of Lithuania and these other countries which are existing in the darkness of the Iron Curtain. Let us make it a time of rededication in the eternal fight for freedom and independence.

This observance here and throughout other lands where people of Lithuanian blood are living today will be heard behind the Iron Curtain. It will clearly demonstrate to the people of Lithuania that they are not forgotten, that their struggles are the struggles of the freedom-loving world.

It will help to keep bright in their minds and hearts the flames of hope for the day of liberation.

Our own Nation must also make it abundantly clear to all other nations that we stand for liberation from tyranny and oppression and for self-determination and freedom of choice for all peoples to ordain and to establish their own form of government under democratic processes.

I, therefore, extend congratulations to the Lithuanian people on this anniversary of their independence day. Let us all join them in more than words in their efforts to unloose the shackles of tyrants and reestablish their independence.

All hail to Lithuania on the anniversary of its 41st birthday. May her courageous people soon regain their precious liberties.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, today we think of wars as the worst events in human history, and as the horrors of destruction and death that are sure to be caused by wars in this atomic bomb and nuclear age, we dread the thought of any war. In this we are probably and rightly justified in regarding wars as scourges of the human race. That is the consensus of today. But in the past, even in the relatively recent past, there have been wars which were regarded as the only way out of difficult international situations, and even out of some imminent calamities. Certainly defensive wars are always treated in this spirit. The First World War is also regarded as such by many peoples who found their liberation and independence in the culmination of that war. As that world holocaust drew to its close, autocratic monarchies tumbled down one after the other: The Russian czarist regime, monarchical Germany, the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and the Sultan of the Ottoman Empire, all perished in that destructive and devastating war. And that war shattered the chains which held millions of innocent and helpless people in bondage and servitude. The Lithuanians were among these people.

The Lithuanian people have a distinct place in the turbulent history of northeastern Europe. They are justly proud of their long and glorious past. For centuries the Lithuanian kingdom was a powerful force in the whole East European region. At times they not only successfully repelled some of the incursions of barbarian invaders from the east, but they were the stouthearted champions of Christianity and its advance guard in that part of Europe. Late in the 16th century their kingdom was united with the Polish kingdom, and formed a dual monarchy. This union lasted for about 200 years. During that time the destinies of both nations were wedded together. In the late 18th century when Poland was partitioned, most of Poland and with it all Lithuania was incorporated into the Russian Empire. But the loss of national independence almost 200 years ago did not mean the loss of the spirit of freedom on the part of Lithuanians. While they suffered under the autocratic regime of the czars, they worked hard for the attainment of their freedom. They became firmly convinced that individual and national well-being could not be fully achieved or enjoyed without national political independence. They learned that in order to enjoy the benefits of their labor, they should have complete freedom in their homeland. To regain that freedom they worked ceaselessly, but it took them more than a full century to see their cherished dream come true. Not until the detested regime of the czars was overthrown could they have their freedom. In 1917 when that regime was shattered by the Russian Revolution, then, along with other peoples, the Lithuanians felt free. On February 16, 1918, they proclaimed their independence and set up their Republic. That day marks a new day in the modern history of the Lithuanian people.

Both in the attainment of Lithuanian independence and in its maintenance for more than two decades the United States has made important contributions, officially and unofficially. The encouragement which the Lithuanians found in the famous 14 points of our former President Wilson was a boon to their cause. It was a source of inspiration for them to know that their struggle for liberty and independence had the support of our wartime President and our people. Nor was the moral and material aid given to Lithuania by the people of this country, especially by the body of our loyal citizens of Lithuanian descent, of less significance. With such aid, and through their own industry and perseverance, the Lithuanian people turned their war-torn country, in a short time, into a happy habitat for all lovers of freedom and liberty. They worked wonders in making Lithuania a prosperous and progressive democracy, a model in many respects. And during those two decades the people were happy, leading a contented life. But, unfortunately, this period did not last long. As the war-clouds began to thicken in the late 1930's, Lithuania sensed the danger to her independence. No mercy was expected from either totalitarian regimes, neither from Berlin nor from Moscow. In the end, however, it was Moscow that in a series of villainous acts put an end to Lithuanian independence in July of 1940 and enslaved the people.

Today, for more than 18 years, unhappy Lithuanians find themselves once more in chains and cut off from all contacts with the free world. There are some 3 million helpless and innocent souls completely sealed off behind the Iron Curtain. Many elemental means of livelihood and all freedoms are denied to them. They live as in a large prison camp, to work as slaves for their taskmasters in the Kremlin. Communist rulers of the country have been doing their very worst to eradicate any feeling of nationality and, one might say, rationality, among its inhabitants. All national events and the observance are rigidly controlled and prescribed. There is no freedom of speech, of press, of movement, and no one is free to correspond with people in the free world. The only freedom these poor souls have, the one which their heartless overlords cannot take away from them, is to cherish their freedom and pray for deliverance from Communist totalitarianism. On this historic anniversary, on the 41st Lithuanian Independence Day, I hope that they will regain their freedom and once more enjoy it in their historic homeland.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, Lithuania was declared an independent state on February 16, 1918, 41 years ago. Each year Lithuanians in the free world commemorate this occasion remembering their fellow countrymen held captive behind the Iron Curtain, who cannot overtly join in any celebration of this historic event.

The development and growth of Lithuania as an independent republic was brought to a tragic end in 1940 when this proud nation again fell prey to the superior force of the Soviet Union. Lithuania along with the other Baltic States was fraudulently annexed to the Soviet Union under the guise of a free election. A puppet government which does not express the will of the people was established.

The example of Lithuania is typical of Communist aggression. In every case the Communists have come to power by means of subversion and infiltration by Soviet agents and occupation of the territory by the Red army and political elements from the Kremlin. The Communists then enslave the people by threats and such inhuman means as wholesale deportations and forced famines.

What little information is obtained from behind the Iron Curtain clearly shows that the Communists in Lithuania and in other captive nations maintain a completely tyrannical rule over the people. Lithuanians can no longer enjoy freedom of expression or religion or any of the inherent rights of individuals. Free labor has been abolished as have all other aspects of individual enterprise. Under Communist rule, the family is no longer the basic unit of society. The state takes the major share of responsibility for the training of youth in order to insure their complete allegiance to the Soviet Communist Union.

These things could happen to all the free people of the world if we do not remain vigilant. Communism is a conspiracy which plans to conquer the whole world and bring all peoples under the domination of the Kremlin.

The people of Lithuania have never stopped wanting their national independence or remaining faithful to the ideals of the free world. But these people need our help and continued assurance of our sympathy and interest in their plight. Let us not forget the Lithuanians who have so bravely and steadfastly fought for freedom in the past and who depend on the friendship and solidarity of the free people of the world.

MINERAL EXTRACTIVE INDUSTRIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. METCALF in the chair). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEED] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, occasionally these days we hear some rise up in opposition to the differential tax treatment accorded the mineral extractive industries. More particularly, we hear suggestions and even demands that the 27½ percent depletion rate for oil and gas should be reduced say to 15 percent. Without attempting to set forth here all of the basic reasons why a cut in percentage depletion would be unsound and contrary to the best interest of the consuming public and, yes, even a threat to national security, I would like to cite you some very startling statistics just published by the U.S. Bureau of Mines.

First when considering these figures, let us keep in mind that one of the primary purposes for percentage depletion is that it helps to recognize that mineral producers are using up their capital upon the removal of each barrel of oil or ton of ore. Thus, depletion helps to provide additional funds to be used in the further search for needed and essential oil and gas reserves.

Of course, some oil producers do get rich just as some men get rich in every endeavor. We are often told that it is because of depletion that oil producers get rich. However, Mr. Speaker, these U.S. Government statistics, that I am about to place in the RECORD, do not bear this out. Instead they show that the oil producing industry in 1955 spent more than three times as much looking for new oil reserves as they could possibly have received in depletion. That is, for every dollar from percentage depletion plowed back in the search for and development of new oil reserves, the oil producing industry put up and spent $2 from other sources.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I am placing in the RECORD a memorandum which includes the results of a study by Mr. C. C. Anderson, Chief Petroleum Engineer, U.S. Bureau of Mines:

PERCENTAGE DEPLETION AND COST OF FINDING PETROLEUM

Government statistics now are available which show the relationship between expenditures for finding and developing new oil reserves and the role percentage depletion plays in this job of finding oil.

The Chief Petroleum Engineer of the U.S. Bureau of Mines, in a paper prepared for the World Power Conference in Montreal, Canada, September 1958, states that in the year 1955 the U.S. petroleum-producing industry—including both independents and major companies—expended a total of $5.1 billion in the search for and development of new petroleum reserves within the United States. This study also shows that for the year 1955, finding and developing costs together with lifting and other operating costs were in excess of income from petroleum production for the entire producing industry by approximately one-half billion dollars.

The $5.1 billion expended in 1955 in the exploration for and development of new oil reserves was equivalent to $2.40 per barrel of net crude oil production in that year. Based on the U.S. Bureau of Mines average wellhead price of crude oil for the year 1955 of $2.77 per barrel, the theoretical maximum percentage depletion could not have exceeded 76 cents per barrel. This depletion figure, however, for petroleum producers is a theoretical maximum, based on the 27½-percent rate, rather than the actual amount of depletion since the 50 percent of net income limitation reduces the average effective depletion rate for the petroleum industry to no more than 23 percent.

Thus, the domestic petroleum industry's exploration and development expenditures alone in 1955—not including lifting costs, taxes, etc.—totaled $2.40 per barrel or more than three times the maximum percentage depletion of 76 cents. That is, for every dollar from percentage depletion plowed back in the search for new oil reserves, the producing industry put up and spent $2 for other sources.

This information, detailed in the accompanying table, clearly demonstrates that the petroleum-producing industry requires new capital far in excess of the depletion deduction to carry on the constant search for new oil and gas reserves.

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I hope that those among us who rise up in opposition to percentage depletion will read and digest these facts and see that the 27½-percent depletion rate for oil and gas is sound and fair. That it has helped to establish and maintain the United States as the world's greatest producer and consumer of petroleum products.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that rather than criticize this tax provision, we should thank God we have it and also that we have an industry that will risk $2 for every one provided through depletion to keep on looking for oil.

THE NEW MINIMUM WAGE BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a bill and a section-by-section analysis of that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, all of us are keenly aware that this session of the Congress must cope with problems of the utmost gravity, both in our domestic affairs and in the world at large. There have already been introduced, in these first few weeks, a great many well-conceived and imaginative proposals to meet the Nation's needs in such areas as unemployment, distressed areas, and defense.

I do not minimize the importance of these measures. But it is my sincere conviction that a bill I have introduced today, with the support of a number of my colleagues on the Committee on Education and Labor, deals with an issue of paramount significance to our own people and to the prestige of democracy throughout the world.

This bill would increase the Federal minimum wage to $1.25 an hour, and would broaden the coverage of the law to include some 7 million workers who now have no wage-hour protection whatever.

The Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, the original wage-hour law, pledged the Congress to correct and as rapidly as possible to eliminate terms of employment which are detrimental to the health and well-being of the Nation's wage earners.

That pledge has never been redeemed. On the contrary, it might well be argued that the original minimum wage of 25 cents an hour, and the original coverage of the law, came closer to meeting its objectives than the $1 minimum and the more restricted coverage of today.

While workers in the higher-paid industries, those who are the most skilled and the most strongly organized, have steadily increased their earnings, millions of their fellow citizens have been limited to the occasional improvements in the minimum wage voted by Congress. And 20 million other workers do not enjoy even this meager protection against low pay and long hours of work.

In the last 3 years alone, the typical worker in such industries as steel, auto, coal mining, and electrical equipment has gained 36 cents an hour in wages. Yet the legal minimum has remained at $1.

Let me note in passing that repeated studies have shown that wage movements among the higher-paid and lower-paid workers are largely independent. The gains by the higher paid do not pull up the less fortunate; and increases among the lower paid, brought about by legislation, have little impact on the others.

In effect, we have created a permanent depressed class in our working force. Whereas one group of American workers enjoys a wage structure based on such minimum rates as $2.07 an hour, as in meatpacking, or $2.01, as in the paper industry, or $2.12 as in auto, and is protected against rising prices by escalator clauses, and receives additional benefits such as pensions and social insurance, another group is condemned to wages of $1 or even less, and enjoy no auxiliary benefits at all.

These drastic differences are bad enough in themselves. What is even worse is the fact that $1 an hour is too little to support a minimum standard of life in the United States today. I will document this point in greater detail in my later presentation to this body; it is enough at this time to ask the Members of this House to contemplate living on an income of $40 a week or less.

The improvements proposed in my bill would deserve prompt and serious consideration even if they involved only the immediate victims of low wages. But there is a much broader application.

The economy of our Nation is based upon high production, high employment, and an ever-expanding national product. These, in turn, require a high level of consumer purchasing power. And that means an adequate minimum income for all Americans, not just a favored majority.

Consider the developments of the last few months, during which we have been recovering from last year's recession.

At first, all the economic indicators were pointing upward. There was widespread optimism. The upturn appeared to be brisk. But then it began to slow down. Unemployment, after a brief decline, is again on the rise. The next monthly figure will almost surely exceed 5 million.

Why is this so? Obviously it is not because we have produced too much for our needs; it is because so many millions of Americans can afford no more than the basic necessities of food, clothing, and shelter, and not enough of these.

Therefore, the plight of these unfortunate Americans—these forgotten people, who year after year have failed to share in our national progress—is not only a challenge to our conscience, but a threat to the economic welfare of us all.

Yet I do not want to pass over the moral side of this issue too lightly. We properly take pride that the United States is the leader and the showcase of the free world. Our most powerful answer to communism, among the underdeveloped peoples, is our own way of life—the fact that our free society has also produced the highest living standard in the world.

While we have in our own midst a depressed class numbering millions, whose members cannot hope to maintain a decent standard of living, our cause is immeasurably weakened.

There are privileged classes in the poorest of nations. Those in India and Africa whose need is for the barest necessities of life do not care how we treat our prosperous citizens. We will be judged by our concern for the least among us.

Let me explain in general terms how my bill proposes to meet these problems.

First, as I said earlier, we propose to increase the minimum wage to $1.25. This is surely a modest figure; it is barely more than half the average earnings of industrial workers as a whole, including the lowest-paid group.

Second, we propose to include some 7 million additional workers under the law's protection—7 million out of the 20 million presently excluded.

I shall submit at a later time an estimate of the numbers who would be affected in various types of businesses. The largest single group—more than half—are in the retail and service trades.

Let me say categorically that my bill will not impose a burden on the small merchant—the corner grocery, the strictly local establishment. The bill specifically excludes enterprises owned and operated by members of the same immediate family. And it excludes all others with gross sales of less than $500,000 a year.

In other words, it excludes 97 percent of the Nation's retail businesses. But the remaining 3 percent employ one-third of the retail workers.

These are the giant chains that are best able to meet the modest terms of this bill—a $1.25 minimum, a basic 40-hour week. And in this connection I would like to cite an interesting statistic.

A study by the Department of Labor in 1954 found that in these large chains—those with 11 or more stores—wages often were worse than in the neighborhood shops.

The proportion of workers earning less than $1 an hour was highest in the big chains—the very operations that can afford to pay, and that give the small merchant his most severe competition.

Clearly, then, my bill not only excludes the small merchant; it would actually help him by forcing his giant rivals to meet fair wage standards.

The same is true in other categories I propose to include under the act. This is apparent in the bill itself, and will be explained in detail in my later discussion.

I also want to anticipate an argument that will be raised against this measure—that it is inflationary. There is no basis for such a fear.

The last two times the Congress has increased the minimum wage, it has instructed the Department of Labor to study the effects of the increase. These studies—one under a Democratic administration—were in general agreement. They found that the impact of a higher minimum was confined almost entirely to the lowest paid; that it had no significant effect on prices; that it had no harmful effect on employment or business solvency.

Another study, contained in a staff report of the Senate Subcommittee on Labor, found that the full application of the Fair Labor Standards Act to retail business, even if the cost were wholly passed on to the consumer, would amount to an increase of one-half of 1 percent in the Consumer Price Index.

Even this brief summary, which has covered only a few of the major benefits involved, is enough, in my opinion, to demonstrate that this bill helps everyone, hurts no one, and is urgently necessary to the future welfare of America.

Finally, it should be noted that a separate bill is being introduced covering agricultural employment and it is hoped that simultaneous consideration will be given to this most important problem.

I am happy to say that Senator KENNEDY and Senator MORSE are introducing a similar measure in the other body.

In view of the lengthy hearings already held on this matter, it is my hope and belief that, without ignoring the importance of full consideration, hearings may be held to the minimum and action achieved at an early date.

I now introduce into the RECORD the text of the bill and a section-by-section analysis of its provisions.

A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the Act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That this Act may be cited as the "Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1959."

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2 (a) Section 2 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended (hereinafter referred to as the "Act"), is amended by inserting after subsection (a) a new subsection (b), to read as follows:

"(b) The Congress further finds that the existence, in retail trade or service and other industries engaged in activities affecting commerce, of labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers, has the effects set forth in subsection (a)."

(b) Section 2 of such Act is further amended by re-lettering subsection (b) as subsection (c).

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. (a) Paragraph (j) of section 3 of such Act, defining the term "produced," is amended to read as follows:

"(j) 'Produced' means produced, manufactured, mined, handled, or in any other manner worked on in any State; and for the purposes of this Act an employee shall be deemed to have been engaged in the production of goods if such employee was employed in producing, manufacturing, mining, handling, transporting, or in any manner working on such goods, or in any process or occupation necessary to the production thereof in any State."

(b) Paragraph (m) of section 3 of such Act, defining the term "wage," is amended to read as follows:

"(m) 'Wage' paid to any employee includes the reasonable cost, as determined by the Secretary, to the employer, of furnishing such employee with board, lodging, or other facilities, if such board, lodging, or other facilities are customarily furnished by such employer to his employees. The Secretary is authorized to determine the fair value of such facilities for defined classes of employees and in defined areas, based on average value to the employer or to groups of employers similarly situated, or average value to groups of employees, or other appropriate measures of fair value. Such evaluations, where applicable and pertinent, shall be used in lieu of actual measure of cost in determining the wage paid to any employee."

(c) Section 3 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(p) 'American vessel' includes any vessel which is defined as a 'vessel of the United States' in title 18, United States Code, section 9, or which is documented or numbered under the laws of the United States;

"(q) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Labor of the United States Department of Labor;

"(r) 'Enterprise' means the related activities performed (either directly or indirectly through unified operation or common control or otherwise) by any person for a common business purpose of providing goods or services, or the products thereof, or a combination of them, to others, and includes all such activities whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units;

"(s) 'Activity affecting commerce' includes any activity in commerce, necessary to commerce, or competing with any activity in commerce, or where the payment of wages at rates below those prescribed by the Act, or the employment of child labor prohibited by this Act, burdens or obstructs or tends to burden or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce;

"(t) 'Employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce' means an employer in any of the following categories who is engaged in any activity affecting commerce:

"(1) any enterprise where such employer has one or more retail establishments if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $500,000 or if the sales of such enterprise for resale or to customers who are engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least $50,000 annually;

"(2) any enterprise where such employer has one or more service establishments if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $500,000 or if the sales of such enterprise to customers who are engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least $50,000 annually;

"(3) any enterprise where such employer has one or more establishments engaged in laundering, cleaning or repairing clothes or fabrics if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $250,000 or if the sales of such enterprise to customers who are engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least 15 per centum of the gross volume of sales of such enterprise;

"(4) any enterprise where such employer is engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban electric railway, trolley, or motorbus carrier;

"(5) any enterprise where such employer is engaged in the business of operating taxicabs if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $500,000;

"(6) any enterprise where such employer is engaged in the business of construction or reconstruction, or both, if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $50,000; or

"(7) any enterprise where such employer has one or more employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce if the annual gross volume of sales of such enterprise is not less than $50,000:

"Provided, That 'employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce' shall not include any retail or service enterprise in which the only employees are the owner of such enterprise and persons standing in the relationship of parent, spouse, or child of such owner."

SPECIAL INDUSTRY COMMITTEES FOR PUERTO RICO AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

SEC. 4. Subsection (a) of section 5 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Secretary of Labor shall as soon as practicable appoint a special industry committee to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands, or in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or employed by an employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce, or the Secretary may appoint separate industry committees to recommend the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees therein engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or employed by an employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce in particular industries. An industry committee appointed under this subsection shall be composed of residents of such island or islands where the employees with respect to whom such committee was appointed are employed and residents of the United States outside of Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. In determining the minimum rate or rates of wages to be paid, and in determining classifications, such industry committee shall be subject to the provisions of section 8."

MINIMUM WAGES

SEC. 5. (a) Subsection (a) of section 6 of such Act is amended by inserting after the words "for commerce" and before the words "wages at" a comma and the following: "and every employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce shall pay to each of his employees".

(c) Subsection (c) of section 6 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The provisions of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of this section shall be superseded in the case of any employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands or American Samoa engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce or employed by an employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce only for so long as and insofar as such employee is covered by a wage order heretofore or hereafter issued by the Secretary pursuant to the recommendations of a special industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5: Provided, That every such employee in Puerto Rico or the Virgin Islands or American Samoa shall, on and after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1959, be paid not less than the minimum wage rate or rates applicable to such employee under any wage order theretofore in effect, increased by the same number of cents per hour by which the minimum wage rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) pursuant to such amendments exceeds the rate theretofore in effect under such paragraph: Provided further, That such minimum wage rate or rates shall be in effect only for so long as and insofar as such minimum wage rate or rates has not been superseded by a wage order fixing a higher minimum wage rate or rates (but not in excess of the rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a)) hereafter issued pursuant to the recommendations of an industry committee appointed pursuant to section 5."

MAXIMUM HOURS

SEC. 6. (a) Subsection (a) of section 7 of such Act is amended by inserting after the words "for commerce" and before the words "for a workweek" a comma and the following: "and no employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce shall employ any of his employees".

(b) Subsection (b) of section 7 of such Act is amended by striking out clause (3) thereof.

(c) Section 7 of such Act is further amended by striking out subsection (c) thereof.

WAGE ORDERS IN PUERTO RICO AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

SEC. 7. Subsection (a) of section 8 of such Act is amended by inserting after the words "for commerce" and before the words "is to reach" in the first sentence the following: "or in an activity affecting commerce"; and by inserting after the words "for commerce" and before the words "in any such industry" in the next to the last sentence the following: "or in an activity affecting commerce".

CHILD LABOR PROVISIONS

SEC. 8. Subsection (c) of section 12 of such Act is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "and no employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce shall employ any oppressive child labor."

EXEMPTIONS

SEC. 9. (a) Subsection (a) of section 13 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The provisions of sections 6 and 7 shall not apply with respect to (1) any employee employed in a bona fide executive, administrative, or professional capacity, or in the capacity of outside salesman (as such terms are defined and delimited by regulations of the Secretary); or (2) any employee employed by an establishment which qualifies as an exempt retail establishment by reason of not being included in subparagraph (1) of paragraph (t) of section 3, notwithstanding that such establishment makes or processes at the retail establishment the goods that it sells: Provided, That more than 85 per centum of such establishment's annual dollar volume of sales of goods so made or processed is made within the State in which the establishment is located; or (3) any employee employed in the catching, taking, harvesting, cultivating, or farming of any kind of fish, shellfish, crustacea, sponges, seaweeds, or other aquatic forms of animal or vegetable life, including the going to and returning from work and loading and unloading when performed by any such employee; or (4) any employee employed in agriculture or in connection with the operation or maintenance of ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways, not owned or operated for profit, or operated on a share-crop basis, and which are used exclusively for supply and storing of water for agricultural purposes; or (5) any employee to the extent that such employee is exempted by regulations or orders of the Secretary issued under section 14; or (6) any switchboard operator who is providing telephone service through a telephone switchboard located in such operator's home; or (7) any individual employed within the area of production (as defined by the Secretary), engaged in handling, packing, storing, ginning, compressing, pasteurizing, drying, preparing in their raw or natural state, or canning of agricultural or horticultural commodities for market, or in making cheese or butter or other dairy products; or (8) any employee or proprietor in an establishment which qualifies as an exempt retail or service establishment by reason of not being included in subparagraph (1) or (2) of paragraph (t) of section 3 engaged in handling telegraphic messages for the public under an agency or contract arrangement with a telegraph company where the telegraph message revenue of such agency does not exceed $500 a month; or (9) any employee employed as a seaman on a vessel other than an American vessel."

(b) Subsection (b) of section 13 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The provisions of section 7 shall not apply with respect to (1) any employee of an express company, sleeping car company, refrigerator car company, or carrier by railroad, subject to the provisions of part I of the Interstate Commerce Act, or (2) any employee of a carrier by air subject to the provisions of title II of the Railway Labor Act; or (3) any employee to the extent that such employee is exempted under the provisions of subsection (e) of this section; or (4) any employee employed as an outside buyer of poultry, eggs, cream, or milk, in their raw or natural state."

(c) Subsection (c) of section 13 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The provisions of section 12, relating to child labor, shall not apply with respect to any employee employed in agriculture who is exempt under clause (4) of subsection (a) of this section, if such employee is employed outside of school hours for the school district where such employee is living while so employed, or to any employee employed as an actor or performer in motion pictures or theatrical productions, or in radio or television productions."

(d) Subsection (d) of section 13 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(d) The provisions of sections 6, 7, and 12 shall not apply to any employee engaged in the delivery of newspapers to consumers at their residences: Provided, That section 12 shall not apply to any employee otherwise engaged in the delivery of newspapers to consumers when such employee is employed outside of school hours for the school district where such employee is living while he is so employed, and such employee is sixteen years of age or over."

(e) Section 13 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (g) to read as follows:

"(g) For purposes of the application of sections 6 and 7 of this Act to any employee employed as a seaman on an American vessel, such employee shall be paid not less than the rate which will provide to such employee, for the period covered by the wage payment, wages equal to compensation at the minimum hourly rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6, or the overtime compensation rate prescribed in subsection (a) of section 7, or both, as may be appropriate, for all hours during such period when he was actually on duty (not including off-duty periods within such periods which are provided pursuant to the employment agreement or periods aboard ship when the employee was not, at the direction of a superior officer, either performing other work or standing by)."

PROHIBITED ACTS: PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE

SEC. 10. Section 15 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (c), to read as follows:

"(c) On and after the effective date of the Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1959, it shall be unlawful for any employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce to perform any act prohibited by, or omit to perform any act required by, subsection (a) of this section."

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 11. This Act shall take effect upon the expiration of ninety days from the date of its enactment.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1959

The proposed Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1959 is a bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting interstate commerce, and to increase the minimum wage for employees under the act to $1.25 an hour.

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

This section contains the title of the bill, "Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1959."

SECTION 2—FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

Section 2 amends section 2 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended (hereinafter referred to as the "act") by adding to this section a new subsection (b) containing an additional congressional finding setting forth the need, in retail trade and service and other industries engaged in interstate commerce, of eliminating labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency and general well-being of workers. The present subsection (b) of section 2 of the act would be relettered as subsection (c).

SECTION 3—DEFINITIONS

Section 3 amends two of the definitions presently included in section 3 of the act and adds to this section of the act definitions of a number of new terms used in the bill.

Subsection (a) amends paragraph (j) of section 3, defining the term "produced." Under the present language of this paragraph, which was adopted in the 1949 amendments to the act, employees are deemed to have been engaged in the production of goods if, among other things, they are employed in "any closely related process or occupation directly essential to the production" of goods. Under the proposed amendment employees would be deemed to be engaged in the production of goods if they are employed in "any process or occupation necessary to the production" of goods.

Subsection (b) amends paragraph (m) of section 3 of the act, defining the term "wage," by adding to this definition standards to enable the Secretary of Labor to determine the fair value of board, lodging or other facilities customarily furnished by an employer to his employees. Such determinations could be for defined classes of employees and in defined areas and could be based on the average value to the employer or groups of employers similarly situated of furnishing to employees the facilities in question or the average value of such facilities to groups of employees, or on other appropriate measures of fair value. It is specified that such evaluations, where applicable and pertinent, shall be used in lieu of actual measure of cost in determining the wage paid to any employee for purposes of the act.

Subsection (c) adds eight new definitions to section 3 of the act:

A new paragraph (p) would define "American vessel," as used in the act, as including any vessel which is defined as a "vessel of the United States" in title 18, United States Code, section 9, or which is documented or numbered under the laws of the United States;

Paragraph (q) specifies that "Secretary," as used in the act, means the Secretary of Labor of the United States Department of Labor;

Paragraph (r) defines the term "enterprise." This term is used in connection with extension of the minimum wage, overtime and child labor provisions to seven types of large enterprises on an employer basis, as set forth in the discussion of the proposed new paragraph (w) below. The term is defined as meaning related activities performed either directly or through unified operation or common control or otherwise, for a common business purpose of providing goods or services, or the products thereof, or a combination of them, to others, and includes all such activities, whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units. Under this definition, the activities of the seven specified types of enterprises as employers of employees under the act are to be viewed as a whole in determining whether any such enterprise is engaged in activities which bring its employees within the scope of the act;

Paragraphs (s) and (t) define the terms "actively affecting commerce" and "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce." Under these definitions, an employee who is not technically engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce will nevertheless be covered if (1) he is employed by any one of seven types of enterprises defined in paragraph (t), and (2) such enterprise is engaged in an activity affecting interstate commerce, as defined in paragraph (s). Paragraph (s) defines the term "activity affecting commerce" as including any activity in commerce, necessary to commerce, or competing with any activity in commerce, or where the payment of wages at rates below those prescribed by the act, or the employment of oppressive child labor prohibited by the act, burdens or obstructs or tends to burden or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce. This definition is substantially the same as and is intended to provide coverage substantially similar to that provided under "affecting commerce" definitions used in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, as amended. Paragraph (t), which defines the term "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce" specifies seven types of establishments to whose employees coverage under the act would be extended by the bill. Under this paragraph coverage is extended on an enterprise basis if the employer is engaged in an activity affecting commerce. This contrasts with the present tests of coverage which are on an employee basis and provide coverage only if the individual employee is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce.

The term "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce" includes seven types of large enterprises whose sales exceed certain specified amounts, based for the most part on current jurisdictional standards being applied by the National Labor Relations Board in determining whether assertion of Board jurisdiction in specific cases would serve the purpose of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The employees of such enterprises will be covered if the employer is engaged in an activity affecting commerce. These seven types of large enterprises are as follows:

1. Any enterprise where the employer has one or more retail establishments if the annual gross sales of such enterprise as a whole are not less than $500,000 or if the sales of such enterprise for resale or to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least $50,000 annually.

2. Any enterprise where the employer has one or more service establishments if the annual gross sales of such enterprise as a whole are not less than $500,000 or if the sales of such enterprise to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least $50,000 annually.

3. Any enterprise where the employer has one or more establishments engaged in laundering, cleaning, or repairing clothes or fabrics, if the annual gross sales of such enterprise as a whole are not less than $250,000, or if the sales of such enterprise to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least 15 percent of the gross sales of the enterprise.

4. Any enterprise where the employer is engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban transit system.

5. Any enterprise where the employer is engaged in the business of operating taxis if the annual gross business of such enterprise as a whole is not less than $500,000.

6. Any enterprise where the employer is engaged in the building and construction industry if the annual gross business of such enterprise as a whole is not less than $50,000.

7. Any enterprise where the employer has one or more employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce if the annual gross business of such enterprise as a whole is not less than $50,000.

A proviso at the end of paragraph (w) specifies that so-called mom and pop shops are not to be covered. The term "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce" specifically excludes any retail or service enterprise in which the only employees are the owner of such enterprise and a parent, spouse or child of such owner.

SECTION 4—SPECIAL INDUSTRY COMMITTEES FOR PUERTO RICO AND VIRGIN ISLANDS

This section makes changes in section 5 of the act, relating to the appointment of industry committees to recommend the minimum rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, so as to give such committees jurisdiction over employees employed by any employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce, as well as over employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. Under the terms of subsection (c) of section 6 of the act, the same procedures which are applicable to the appointment of industry committees and the issuance of minimum wage orders for employees in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are applicable to employees in American Samoa.

SECTION 5—MINIMUM WAGES

Subsection (a) amends subsection (a) of section 6 of the act to make the minimum wage provisions apply not only to every employee engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to every employee of every employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce, as defined in paragraph (w) of section 3 of the act, as amended. Certain exemptions continue to be provided for in section 13 of the act, as amended, but heretofore exempt employees will be entitled to be paid in accordance with section 6 of the act as amended, if they are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce unless such employees are specifically exempt from the application of such section under the provisions of subsections (a), (d), or (f) of section 13 of such act, as amended.

Subsection (b) amends paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6 of the act by raising the minimum wage under the act from $1 to $1.25 an hour.

Subsection (c) amends subsection (c) of section 6 of the act, applicable to the issuance of wage orders for employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa, so that wage orders may be issued not only with respect to any such employees who are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also with respect to any such employees who are employed by an employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce. A proviso is included in this section which specifies that the minimum wage rates applicable to any employee covered by a wage order heretofore in effect for employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands or American Samoa shall be increased by the same number of cents per hour as the minimum wage prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6 is increased by the bill. Such minimum wage rate or rates, if less than the rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) as amended, are to be in effect only for so long as and insofar as such minimum wage rate or rates are not superseded by a subsequent wage order issued in accordance with sections 5 and 8, as amended, fixing a higher minimum wage rate or rates, not in excess of the rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a).

SECTION 6—MAXIMUM HOURS

Subsection (a) amends subsection (a) of section 7 to make the maximum hours provision of the act apply not only to nonexempt employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to non-exempt employees employed by any employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce. Certain exemptions continue to be provided for in section 13 of the act, as amended, but heretofore exempt employees will be entitled to be paid in accordance with section 7 of the act if they are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce unless such employees are specifically exempt from the application of such section under the provision of subsections (a), (b), (d), or (f) of section 13 of the act, as amended.

Subsection (b) amends subsection (b) of section 7 of the act by striking from this subsection the so-called "seasonal industry" exemption contained in clause 3 of this subsection.

Subsection (c) amends section 7 by striking out the maximum hours exemptions applicable to employees engaged in certain specified agricultural handling and processing occupations contained in subsection (c) of such section.

SECTION 7—WAGE ORDERS IN PUERTO RICO AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

This section amends section 8 of the act so that wage orders issued under the act with respect to employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, or American Samoa shall apply not only to employees in such islands who are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to any such employees who are employed by an employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce.

SECTION 8—CHILD-LABOR PROVISIONS

This section amends subsection (c) of section 12 of the act by providing that the child-labor provisions shall not only apply to employers engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to employers engaged in activity affecting commerce. Certain exemptions continue to be provided for in section 13 of the act, as amended, but child labor which has heretofore been permitted will be prohibited under section 12, if the employer is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce unless such child labor is specifically exempt from such section under the provisions of subsection (c), (d), or (f) of section 13 of such act, as amended.

SECTION 9—EXEMPTIONS

Subsections (a) and (b) of this section rewrite and make the following changes in subsections (a) and (b) of section 13 of the act:

(a) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees employed in a local retailing capacity, presently contained in clause (1) of subsection (a), have been eliminated. The present exemptions for executive, administrative, and professional employees and for outside salesmen, however, are retained.

(b) Clauses (2) and (3) containing minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable to employees of retail, service and laundry, cleaning and repairing enterprises have been eliminated. The new coverage provisions specify the types of retail service and laundry, cleaning, and repairing enterprises that would be covered by the bill.

(c) Clause (5) has been amended to eliminate the present minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees engaged in packing or other processing of fish or seafood products. Fishing and other occupations which precede packing and processing of such products would, however, continue to be exempt.

(d) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees of weekly, semiweekly, and daily newspapers contained in clause (8) have been eliminated.

(e) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees of street, suburban, and interurban transit systems contained in clause (9) have been eliminated. The new coverage provisions specify the types of enterprises engaged in the business of operating any such system that would be covered by the bill.

(f) Although overtime exemptions for employees engaged in certain agricultural processing occupations have been eliminated, as explained in the discussion of section 6 of the bill, supra, existing exemptions from the minimum wage and overtime provisions applicable to specified agricultural processing operations in the area of production contained in clause (10) have been retained.

(g) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable to certain telephone switchboard operators under clause (11) have been amended to apply only where the operator is providing telephone service through a telephone switchboard located in the operator's home.

(h) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees of employers engaged in the business of operating taxicabs contained in clause (12) have been eliminated. The new coverage provisions specify the types of enterprises engaged in the business of operating taxis that would be covered by the bill.

(i) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable under clause (14) to employees employed as seamen have been amended to apply only to seamen employed on vessels other than American vessels. A new subsection (g) is added to section 13 of the act, specifying the manner in which the minimum wage and overtime provisions are to be applicable to employees employed as seamen on American vessels.

(j) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable under clause (15) to employees of sawmills employing 12 or fewer employees have been eliminated.

(k) The overtime exemptions applicable to pipeline and trucking employees under clause (1) of subsection (b) of section 13 have been eliminated.

(l) The overtime exemptions applicable to canning of fish or seafood products under clause (4) of subsection (b) of section 13 have been eliminated.

(m) Employees in American Samoa subject to the provisions of subsection (e) of section 13 would be exempt from the overtime provisions under a new clause (3) of subsection (b) of section 13, as amended.

The bill continues the present minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable to retail establishments that make or process the goods which they sell and to contract telegraph agencies maintained in exempt retail or service establishments where the telegraph message revenue of the agency does not exceed $500,000 a month. It also retains the minimum wage and overtime exemption for employees employed in agriculture or in connection with nonprofit ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways used for supplying or storing water for agricultural purposes. Similarly, the minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees covered by subminimum wage rates fixed by the Secretary under section 14 of the act for learners, apprentices, and handicapped workers is retained. Presumably the Secretary would proceed promptly to review these subminimum rates upon enactment of the higher minimum wage rate provided for in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6 of the act, as amended.

The various clauses of subsections (a) and (b) have been renumbered to take account of clauses which would be repealed.

Subsection (c) of section 9 amends subsection (c) of section 13 of the act to make clear that the exemption from the child labor provisions applicable to children employed in agriculture is restricted to children employed in agricultural work which is exempt under clause (4) of subsection (a) of section 13, as amended. This exemption would apply only to children employed outside of school hours for the school district where such children are living while so employed.

Subsection (d) adds to subsection (d) of section 13 of the act a new proviso specifying that the child labor provisions shall not apply to any newspaper delivery employee, other than newsboys engaged in residential delivery of newspapers, if such employee is employed outside of school hours for the school district where the employee is living while he is so employed and the employee is 16 years of age or over.

Subsection (e) adds to section 13 of the act a new subsection (g) which provides that for purposes of the application of the minimum wage and overtime provisions to seamen employed on American vessels, such employees are to be paid not less than the rate which will provide to the employee, for the period covered by the wage payment, wages equal to compensation at the prescribed minimum wage rate or overtime rate, or both, as may be appropriate, for all hours during such period when the employee was actually on duty. This period, however, is not to include off-duty hours within such period which are provided pursuant to the employment agreement applicable to such employee or to periods aboard ship when the employee was not, at the direction of a superior officer, either performing other work or standing by.

SECTION 10—PROHIBITED ACTS: PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE

This section adds to section 15 of the act a new subsection (c) providing that the provisions of subsection (a) of this section declaring certain violations of the act and other actions of an employer to be unlawful when engaged in by such employer with respect to any employee engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce shall be applicable to every employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce with respect to any employee of an enterprise where the employer is so engaged.

SECTION 11—EFFECTIVE DATE

This section specifies that the act shall take effect 90 days after the date of enactment.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman spoke of unemployment; are this Government's free trade policies contributing to the unemployment presently existing? Does the gentleman have any figures on that?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Such figures are available but I do not have sufficient time at my disposal to present them.

I believe sincerely that there are a great many industries which we could study and review, and there certainly are some things in our foreign policy that could be done. With those changes fewer American workers would be out of work. I can be very specific about it. I believe that a change in our foreign policy is necessary to enable Japanese goods in many instances to be sold in Asia which today are being sold in the United States because we do not allow Japan to sell them in Asia—I believe that change alone would put a great many Americans back to work. That is only one example. I believe our whole foreign policy should be reconstituted wherever possible to see that that kind of competition does not hurt the American wage earner.

Mr. GROSS. How many of these underdeveloped countries are there left? I thought we had taken care of Japan, Germany, France, and Italy.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I have always believed in these reciprocal treaties but have felt they should be reciprocal in that these countries with which we have these treaties would work in every way to raise their standards of living to ours. Unless we can see progress in that field we are not being fair with our own workers.

Mr. GROSS. Was not one of the objects of the foreign aid program to raise the standard of living in the countries aided?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. That is correct, and great progress has been made in some of those countries.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman uses the phrase "underdeveloped countries"; are France and Britain considered to be underdeveloped? Is Italy supposed to be underdeveloped? Where are these underdeveloped countries of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I think the gentleman will find that in Africa and Asia there are many underdeveloped countries, countries that for the first time are beginning to exercise the privilege of self-government, but countries where the standard of living needs to be raised.

Mr. GROSS. I understand there are some 50,000 people on the relief rolls in the District of Columbia and that there are at least 1,300 school children who cannot go to school regularly in the District of Columbia because they do not have shoes. Is this an underdeveloped area?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. There are underdeveloped areas in this country.

Mr. GROSS. I am tired of hearing about underdeveloped areas in far-distant foreign countries.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I am sure if the gentleman examines my bill he will find I am dealing exactly with that subject, the underdeveloped areas of this country. We want to improve the lot of the wage earners in this country to give them a decent standard of living.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. AVERY. I appreciate the gentleman's yielding to me. It was not my privilege to be on the floor and hear the gentleman's entire statement, but I did hear portions of it. I wonder if the gentleman can tell the House something about this: I have read newspaper articles from time to time although I have not been officially advised, that Mr. Reuther is making proposals similar to the one the gentleman has made here in the House and the Senator from Massachusetts is making in the Senate. Can the gentleman tell me whether the proposals made by himself and the Senator from Massachusetts are identical to Mr. Reuther's proposal or are there some differentials?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. No, sir; they are quite different. I do not know whether the gentleman heard me say this; but, No. 1, in this present bill there is no effort to cover the situation in the agricultural field; this is left out of this bill. I have said we hoped to cover it in a different bill a little later on, but it is not in this bill. There are a number of other substantial changes with respect to commerce, and so forth.

Mr. AVERY. I did hear the gentleman say that in his bill he had left out the small storekeeper, small business, and so on, and so forth. Can the gentleman make a categorical reference there?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. We call them the "mom and pop" stores.

Mr. AVERY. That definition belongs to the gentleman and I would not want to comment on that. But my question is this: Would the cost of living of the employees of that particular store be less than for the other employees the gentleman seeks to cover?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. In general, I think so, because you will find, for instance, in the small store, the "mom and pop" store, that they do not have the same kind of working conditions, the same kind of problems. Many times a man and his wife will work together. If you impose this kind of regulation on them it would make it impossible for them to compete with the larger stores. At the same time it actually helps them as a family to get a better family income.

Mr. AVERY. I could not agree with the gentleman more, but I do not believe he has thought this proposal through to its ultimate conclusion. Even though he sets out certain exemptions, at the same time the proposal the gentleman makes or is going to make will be applicable to certain stores in the Middle West and will make it impossible for them to compete with the bigger stores, even though they may not be a large institution. They would not come in the category the gentleman mentions.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I think if the gentleman had given as much time and study to this whole subject as I have, and as our committee has, he would find out actually, as I pointed out in my statement, that that is not true. The competition largely comes from the big stores that are paying these depressed wages. The little stores perhaps with one or two people in general and on the average are paying more than the suggested minimum wage. They largely pay higher wages all along the line and we believe, so does the Department of Labor incidentally, that this competitive situation can be evened out or equalized, that competition will be encouraged and the little store will be given a greater opportunity to survive in our economy.

Mr. AVERY. That is a very interesting observation and again I must apologize for not being here when the gentleman started. The gentleman said, "We believe." He is referring to the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. To many of us on that committee, also to the testimony that has been given our committee by officials of the Department of Labor in the past.

Mr. AVERY. I might say parenthetically that I am anticipating serving on the Select Committee on Small Business. Has that committee taken any position on the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. As far as I know, it has not taken a position on the question of minimum wages.

Mr. AVERY. It might be most appropriate for that committee to explore that field.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. There are provisions in the committee's resolution of authority providing that the Small Business Committee shall not undertake anything which other committees are investigating, and I think we would be ruled out on that score. Perhaps the gentleman would want to discuss that with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. AVERY. I certainly will, and I am glad to hear that particular rule being reemphasized on the floor here today.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. My understanding was, as the gentleman spoke earlier, that he thinks the trouble confronting us now is the inability of the average wage earner to purchase the necessities of life; therefore, we must increase that minimum wage, which applies only to a certain group.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I said I thought it was important to increase the purchasing power of that depressed part of the working population of this country so that they might in their turn contribute to the ability of our economy to expand, because if they have a decent wage they will be able to buy things which in turn by their purchases will enable others to have jobs.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Right there, if they get a decent wage they can buy?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman is assuming the prices will not go up.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. No. I have referred specifically to the history of the previous increases in the minimum wage and in every instance it did not increase the price level; in every instance, even if you figured you would pass it on to the consumer, you would find out that the impact on the price level was less than one-half of 1 percent. You cannot go against history.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Is the gentleman trying to tell me that my dollar today will buy as much as it did 20 years ago?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. I hope I am not that foolish. I am trying to tell the gentleman the past history of the effect of increasing the minimum wage in order to help the less fortunate workers of this country.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is theory, that is all it is. That is not experience.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. It is fact, and the able gentleman can find it in the testimony of the Department of Labor.

SUSAN B. ANTHONY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the present session of the Congress, I introduced House Joint Resolution 28 proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women. As is our custom, Mr. Speaker, we always mention this resolution, or at least I do, and have, I am sorry to say, for a great many years, at the time of the anniversary of Susan B. Anthony, which occurred on the 15th of February.

This year I received the following telegram from the President of the United States, which I will read into the RECORD at this point:

> The women of America owe a special debt of gratitude to this beloved patriot. The men of America also hold her memory in highest regard. It was she who helped to provide us with a splendid array of full voting partners to share the burdens of leadership in the modern world. I am delighted to take part in this ceremony marking the 139th anniversary of her birth.
> DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said before, for many years this resolution has been before the Congress, and for many years it has received good and great support from Members of the Congress. This year 41 Members of this House have introduced resolutions similar to House Joint Resolution 28.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that their names and the numbers of these resolutions be included at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

(The names and numbers are as follows:)

1. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE, New York, Republican; House Joint Resolution 28; January 7, 1959.
2. GEORGE H. FALLON, Maryland, Democrat; House Joint Resolution 48; January 9, 1959.

Puerto Rico: ANTONIO FERNÓS-ISERN.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring your thoughts back to Susan B. Anthony and to some of the things that she stood for and to some of the reasons for this resolution.

It may seem incredible today, but it is nevertheless true that Susan B. Anthony was tried on June 18, 1873. The crime with which she was charged, and for which she was duly sentenced, was that she had voted illegally and in defiance of the 14th amendment to the Constitution.

The judge at that time was careful to point out that the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments were written into the Constitution to safeguard the rights of the recently enfranchised Negroes. But, he pointed out with care that these amendments were based on the words: "The right of the citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." He pointed out that the word "sex" was omitted and that therefore, in his opinion, women did not have the right to vote.

All this happened less than 100 years ago and as I said before, Mr. Speaker, today it seems incredible and slightly ridiculous.

And yet, as we examine the Constitution today, we nowhere find that women have been given equality under the law. True they have been given the right to vote through the passage of the 19th amendment and that great step forward has perhaps spelled complete equality to those taking a superficial view of the situation.

To give but a few cases of inequality before the law, which in many peoples' opinion will never be corrected until women are made equal under the law through a constitutional amendment:

In some of our States women cannot serve on juries. In one State, the separate property of a wife, owned at the time of marriage, is divided into dotal and extradotal. Dotal property, or dowry, is that which the wife brings to the husband to assist him in bearing the expenses of the marriage establishment. The husband is under no such obligation. The income from this dotal property belongs to the husband. He has the administration of the dowry, and although it was originally the wife's property, she cannot deprive him of this right.

In eight States the husband must join with the wife in order to make a valid conveyance.

Recognition in common law of the husband as the sole support, without recognition of the wife's services as part of that support, is unsound. Recognition of the wife's contribution would strengthen the family as a unit. The husband would no longer enjoy special status as the sole provider even when the wife was also earning.

Women occupy a secondary position as parents in 14 States which give preference to the father as guardian of the minor children. Unequal marital status under State laws affects property rights, right to operate own business, and right to control own earnings. The amendment would force States to bring their laws into line within a certain period.

Progress has made protective legislation for women obsolete. Such legislation operates to the disadvantage of women in many cases where employment preferences and overtime are involved. Many State laws discriminate against women under the guise of safety and welfare legislation. Women can now protect themselves by organization.

The amendment would encourage a revision of State labor laws along more realistic lines, based on the nature of the work rather than the sex of the worker. Safety and health regulations should apply to both men and women. Adult working women are entitled to use their judgment as to hours and type of work.

Social insurance systems which fail to grant equal benefits to the family of a woman worker are unjust. Equalization would give greater justice to husbands, wives, and children.

Might I point out, Mr. Speaker, that the husbands of Members of Congress are not entitled to the same rights as the wives of Members of Congress, which is another injustice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize that once again we are going to hear sobs and groans over the cruel destruction of protective legislation for women.

Again, at the risk of repeating what I have said many times before on the floor of this House, there has been, and I trust always will be, special legislation for various groups of citizens. This does not deprive them of equality under the Constitution. Veterans have special legislation which applies only to them. The sick, the aged, the poor, the blind—all have special legislation applying only to them. Today students are the recipients of many benefits under special legislation. None of these groups are deprived of their rights under the Constitution for this reason, and it is absurd and hypocritical to pretend that this amendment would mean the end of special and necessary legislation and laws applicable to women.

Just as a woman cannot be a veteran in the sense that she has not shouldered a gun, neither can a man give birth to a child, and he certainly, therefore, is not entitled to maternity benefits.

It is also funny, but not factual, that every time some opponents of the measure, with more humor than brains, see a picture of some Russian crone cleaning the streets of Moscow they rush to the protagonists of the amendment, saying: "Ah, here you have equality." Well, Mr. Speaker, the day our women clean the streets, our men will be in slave labor camps, and personally I would prefer to clean the streets.

No, Mr. Speaker, there are reasons, and one of the principal reasons is that there are people in this country who do not want to see women get equal pay for equal work. I do not believe that they ever will get equal pay for equal work until they are first-class citizens under the Constitution.

The excuse of protective legislation is very thin indeed. When it comes to actual strength and longevity, it is a well known fact that women are stronger and live longer than men. It is a very sad fact but it is a true one. No, the old saying that the female of the species is more deadly than the male is actually a true, and not a very cheering, thought.

Women do need equality. Women do need to be paid for what they do, and to be paid in full if they do the same work and do it as well. That is not the case in our country today.

I know many people who object to this amendment on both sides of the aisle. May I point out here that this is not a partisan matter. The equal rights amendment has been in both party platforms for a number of years, so there is no partisanship whatsoever in this matter. That will be well demonstrated by the list of sponsors and the list of Members introducing identical amendments.

No, as a matter of fact it is time that we at least gave the States the right to pass on this amendment. What are we so afraid of? That is my question always. Why are we afraid, when we give women so much in this country, to at least allow them equality under the Constitution, which incidentally, if that Constitution had been written within the last 20 years, they would have obtained automatically? The only reason it is not so is that our Constitution is the oldest written constitution in the world, and at the time it was originally written and conceived women were merely chattels under the British common law and under the law of our own country.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this time that my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DOWDY] may extend his remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. METCALF). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWDY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday marked the 139th anniversary of the birth of a baby girl who became one of the foremost women of her time, Susan B. Anthony. Today I would like to join with an honored lady of our time, the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE], in supporting her resolution that proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women. She is to be commended for her leadership in the efforts to insure equal rights for the men and women of our country, and I am happy to have been associated with her on this matter in past Congresses and in this Congress. It is hoped that in this 86th Congress the work started by Miss Anthony for equal rights will meet with success and the amendment presented to the States for approval.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, the gentlewoman from Michigan [Mrs. GRIFFITHS], may extend her remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, we are here today, once again, urging action on a resolution which proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women. For 36 years this proposed amendment has been pending before Congress.

The equal-rights amendment has only one aim—to raise women in this great country of ours to the status of full and equal citizenship. Since the beginning of our Republic, women have been relegated to an inferior position with respect to their citizenship.

Our democratic faith is certainly strong enough, our economic system dynamic enough, and our sense of fair play elastic enough to make women full citizens.

It is tragic that our democracy should be imperfect in that we tolerate discrimination against women solely because of sex. We would not for a moment accept discriminatory practices based on color of eyes or hair. Inferior treatment of women is just as senseless. The best way to correct this unfair practice is by adoption of the equal-rights amendment. Such action is long overdue.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, as a co-author of this amendment, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlewoman from New York. I believe she has made a very specific and intelligent statement on this very important amendment to the Constitution.

As a consistent sponsor of the equal-rights amendment, I have urged that women be accorded their full equality with men in every phase of business, professional, and domestic activity, and that they be accepted to full partnership in the duties and responsibilities of the government of our Nation, both on the national and the local level. I have also urged the adoption of the equal-rights amendment, as proposed in House Joint Resolution 92 which I introduced, which would render all laws discriminating against women because of their sex null and void.

We have recognized the equal rights of human beings to live and work in a Nation where they will not face discrimination because of race, color, and creed, and even now seek legislation to strengthen the guarantee against discrimination. But we have ignored discrimination against women because of their sex. And we will never achieve our goal of equal rights for all our citizens until we have removed all existing discrimination against women and adopted the equal-rights amendment to the Constitution to assure women of their equal rights under the law of the land.

I further support the equal-rights amendment because it would write into the Federal Constitution a permanent dependable bill of rights for women.

It would wipe out common-law interpretation and bring women under the full protection of the Constitution.

It would be a mandate to the States to bring their laws into line within 3 years.

It would encourage a revision of State labor laws along more just and realistic lines, based on the nature of the work and not on the sex of the worker.

It would effectively back up equal pay legislation.

It would protect women from discriminatory legislation in the future.

It recognizes women as human beings and responsible citizens and as such entitled to share with men freedom and equality both of which are necessary for human development.

It is in harmony with American ideals of freedom, equality, and justice.

It is in harmony with the principles of the United Nations Charter.

It would give our Government unquestionable authority to sign international conventions affirming the equal rights of men and women.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I thank my colleague.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield to my colleague from Florida.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the distinguished gentlewoman for making this very interesting and factual talk to the House of Representatives. As our colleague knows, I have had the high honor and pleasure of introducing her amendment, the equal rights amendment for the women of our country. It is such an obvious thing that I just cannot understand why it has not long since been passed. I certainly want to assure the gentlewoman that I am going to continue my interest and cooperation. I surely hope that she will be successful in soon seeing this great ambition of hers come to pass, and that is that equal rights for women become an indelible part of the Constitution of the United States.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I thank the gentleman. I know that with his help we will get a lot further.

Mrs. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield to my colleague, the gentlewoman from Washington.

Mrs. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to commend our distinguished colleague, the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE]. She has given this very fine piece of legislation 11 years of service. As a new Member of this body, I want to state that long before coming here I heard of her work in this field. It is true, as she has indicated, that women's groups throughout the United States with ever-increasing interest are giving their support to it as they have learned to better understand the overall effect of this equal rights amendment. Distinguished groups of women such as the Business and Professional Women, the Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Women's Party are backing this equal rights amendment. But, in addition, I think I would like to repeat, as Mrs. ST. GEORGE has pointed out, that service groups and men's groups throughout the country are also bringing a new interest to it as they understand it. Our distinguished colleague, as has already been indicated, has introduced this amendment for 11 years now, I believe it is, and certainly we can hope that this year, perhaps, our Members in the Congress will take a fresh new look at it. It sometimes happens that a position taken on a certain matter in the past becomes a stand that one does not move from until all at once the time comes when you say to yourself "Let us take a new look at this." This, of course, is what our distinguished colleague from New York is pleading that we do today. Certainly, the excuses and arguments that have been made against this legislation in the past under close scrutiny have become worn and threadbare and if given intelligent discussion and consideration prove to be very weak indeed.

I commend my distinguished colleague again for the great fight she has made in this field. I, too, have joined in sponsoring a copy of her bill and am very proud to stand by her side as a new Member in this body, in an effort to have it given consideration.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I thank the lady from Washington and I appreciate her support.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. In a number of States, as in Iowa, we have divorce laws which are more favorable to the women in a divorce case than to the man in a divorce case. I have said on many occasions, and I still hold to that position, that I, like I think everyone to whom I have spoken about this matter agrees, want equal pay for women for equal work. But we are concerned about a Federal law which would repeal State laws such as we have in Iowa, which are more favorable to women in alimony cases than to men.

Would the gentlewoman, for whom I have the highest regard, speak on that subject?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I would be delighted to do so.

May I tell the gentleman from Iowa first of all that I do not entirely agree with him. I have always been in favor of a national divorce law. My personal opinion, for what it is worth, is that our divorce laws are an absolute shambles. I also think that the alimony racket in this country, where of course the man is usually penalized, is also very bad and very unfair. I am glad that my colleague brought this question up, because that is one of the points that I am afraid has not been sufficiently cleared. This amendment is entitled "Equal Rights for Men and Women." It is not just for women. The only reason that women play such a part in the amendment is that they are the ones, presumably, who do not have equal rights. But here again there are some fields in which men do not have equal rights. I am fully cognizant of that. Having worked on the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I have seen many cases where the word "widow" was in a bill but never the word "widower." I have always wanted to see in this country, rather than the "quicky" divorces, which can be obtained in a great many States, and which incidentally are a very profitable business for some of those States, a national divorce law that would be safe and sound.

Mr. JENSEN. Will the gentlewoman yield further?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I think that speaking generally men favor equal rights for women. I think that is a fair statement. I have always said that, and I have heard that same thing said by many, many men. Without doubt, that is why the States have passed divorce laws which were more favorable to women than to men. As the lady knows, generally speaking, if there are children involved in a divorce proceeding, the children will adhere closer to the mother than to the father. I think perhaps that is why the State legislatures have felt that the women were entitled to more consideration in divorce proceedings than were the men. I want to vote for the equal-rights amendment but when I look at the laws of my State—and we still have State sovereignty where the States have the privilege of passing laws which affect their people—I hesitate to agree to vote for an equal rights amendment which would repeal the benefits which the women have in my State relative to alimony. It is a difficult thing to do, as I see it. I am going to be very frank with the gentlewoman and say that no one has yet given me a reason, a good reason, a reason that I can expound to the people I have the honor to represent in Congress, a reason for voting for the Federal equal rights amendment which would repeal the benefits which my State gives the women in divorce laws.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I do not know whether the gentleman heard what I said in that respect. I pointed out that there would always be special legislation, I trust, for special classes of citizens. That, of course, would include women; it would include men. I pointed out that there is special legislation right now and there will continue to be special legislation for veterans, for students, for the poor, for the handicapped, for all manner of citizens; they have special legislation. There is no doubt that certain of this special legislation would apply only to women such as the maternity benefits, and so forth; and there is no reason why they should, because of that, be declared second-class citizens. I agree the same thing would apply in the gentleman's State, for instance, to divorce laws: In my State of New York they are totally different from the divorce laws in the gentleman's State; they are certainly very different from the divorce laws in the State of Nevada and many others. The law in the States could not be transformed everywhere, and certainly this amendment would in nowise transform it in any way.

The gentleman says he believes that men in general in the United States are in favor of giving women more rights and more privileges. To a certain extent that is true, but it is true only of a favored few. I know a great many men who shudder at, and who do not like the idea at all—and they are in very, very high places in labor—of giving women equal pay for equal work. They fear the competition of women in the labor market; and there is perhaps some good reason for that fear, in view of the unemployment problems we have today. But I very much fear that this idea of giving equal pay for equal work before giving full equality under the Constitution is merely, to speak frankly, putting the cart before the horse.

Mr. JENSEN. If the gentlewoman will yield further, I can assure the gentlewoman, and I can assure everyone within the sound of my voice or in this great land of ours, that I am for a bill which will give equal rights to the women for equal work. I only wish that would be as far as the gentlewoman's bill would go. I would hope that we would not need to pass Federal law which would repeal State laws which are so favorable to women. It is my position. I just cannot help it.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. May I say to the gentleman from Iowa that I think his fears are groundless. The amendment is very simple and, as the gentleman well knows, it will have to be passed by three-quarters of the States. It will have to run the full gantlet and the States themselves will make the decision as to whether there is danger to them and to their special legislation under this amendment. I personally would not have introduced the amendment if I believed such would be the case. I cannot find it is, in any of my studies, and I assure the gentleman they have been long and arduous.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the 139th anniversary of the birthday of Susan Brownell Anthony, it is fitting that we should pause for a few moments to pay her tribute as the one person, from a field of many who fought in the same cause, who truly gave her life for the sake of gaining for members of her sex equal privileges and rights under the Law.

It is, of course, debatable whether Miss Anthony can be listed as the mother of the suffrage movement. We remember that the daughter of Lord Calvert and niece of Lord Baltimore, Miss Margaret Brent, made quite a vociferous case in 1647 that she be allowed "place and voyce" in the Maryland Assembly. Likewise, Abigail Adams gave her husband John a little lecture before he went off to the Continental Congress in 1776, admonishing him to be a good deal more considerate of the fair sex in drawing up the laws of the new Nation than his forefathers had been. It would thus seem that the tendency of women to actively bother about their political status dates back at least to the beginnings of our beloved Republic.

It is, however, scarcely debatable that Susan B. Anthony did more, more vigorously, to create a national women's movement than any of her predecessors or her contemporaries. Although Lucretia Mott presided over the first Washington convention of the suffragettes 90 years ago this winter, and though Elizabeth Cady Stanton was elected first president of the National American Women's Suffrage Movement—which combined two smaller groups—even these two women, who were her friends, admitted that it was Miss Anthony who was the wit and intellect, the energy and fire that caused the movement to grow into a meaningful force for women's rights.

She did indeed have a quick wit. She was one of the few persons, whether male or female, ever to silence, however temporarily, the sharp-tongued Horace Greeley. At a New York meeting just after the close of that period which some refer to as "the recent unpleasantness," Susan Anthony was found speaking out for equal voting rights for women. Greeley remarked that the ballot went with the bullet, and inquired of Miss Anthony whether she would be willing to fight to have this right. She immediately replied: "Yes, Mr. Greeley, just as you fought in the late war, at the end of a goose quill."

Susan Anthony it was also who almost broke up a suffragette movement once by rising on the convention floor and sharply reminding the sweet-voiced lecturer that although the lady had the undoubted right to address the group, she had better speak up and be heard or she would find herself without an audience.

She was, of course, not just a courageous and quick debater. Her courage took other, perhaps more significant, forms. She went to jail once for the crime of voting. And I think it must have taken some courage to turn down the several marriage proposals she is said to have received as the result of her comeliness and intelligence.

She chose her cause, believed in her cause, fought resolutely in that cause, and, sadly, died before she realized that the fight had not been in vain. Just 14 years after death came to her in 1906, in her 86th year of life, the 19th amendment to the Constitution was proclaimed to be in effect by the Secretary of State on August 26, 1920, and thereby was gained for all American women the privilege and right to cast their ballots in all subsequent elections.

It is right, as I have said, that we should pause to honor the memory of Susan B. Anthony with our well-meant but feeble words. I wonder, however, Mr. Speaker, if it would not be more of a tribute to her, and to the women of America whose cause she so nobly espoused, if we gave thought to the fact that even today the rights of women are not fully protected by law; that in such areas as Federal employment, women still do not receive equal consideration with men; and facing up to that fact, would it not be more of a tribute if we let our actions speak louder than our words ever could in honor of Susan B. Anthony and the American woman.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join with my colleague from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] in paying special tribute today, as has the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE], to Susan B. Anthony. While some of us in this body, Mr. Speaker, may feel some of the reservations of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN] with respect to the actual effect of the gentlewoman's resolution, I think all of us join in sharing her determination to carry on the fight against discrimination which Susan B. Anthony fought so effectively and so long. As a graduate of the University of Rochester with which Susan B. Anthony was so long connected, and which has many great memorials to her, I desire to join with my colleagues in this body in paying tribute to that great American woman, who fought so long and successfully for the 19th amendment to the Federal Constitution. Miss Anthony spent many of the years of her active life in Rochester, N.Y., and contributed immensely to the cultural life of that great city and also to the great University of Rochester which is located there.

As an undergraduate at Rochester I learned early of the great work for which Miss Anthony was famous. As we pause today to pay tribute to her, Mr. Speaker, and to her fight for an end to discrimination by reason of sex, may we also dedicate ourselves to continuing the great fight for full equality for American women which Susan B. Anthony so nobly advanced.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the subject of my discussion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, today we commemorate the birthday anniversary of Susan B. Anthony. It would be no exaggeration to say that every woman who holds a job, who goes to college, who is a doctor, lawyer, scientist, professor; every mother who has equal guardianship of her children; every woman who controls her own property, her own wages; every woman who votes or holds office, owes a debt of gratitude to Susan B. Anthony, which never can be repaid.

Born on a farm near Adams, Mass., she was a pioneer in more than the suffrage movement. She was for justice alike for both sexes and all colors and races.

Courage and determination are New England traits, and it took tremendous courage for Miss Anthony to persist when even many of the women for whom she was fighting turned their backs on her. She appeared on the American scene at a time when the cause she championed was not only unpopular among men but among women as well. It was for her to kindle the spark of public opinion in favor of the cause of woman suffrage. It is said that public opinion is one of the great factors in America, and when it is refined by the fire of full and free discussion, it becomes a wholesome expression of the views of the people.

It was in 1872 that she cast her ballot at the New York State and congressional elections in Rochester to test the application of the 14th and 15th amendments of the Constitution of the United States. For this she was indicted for illegal voting and was fined, but the fine was never exacted.

Her last notable appearance was as a delegate to the International Council of Women in London, England, in the year 1899. In 1900 there was a great popular demonstration in our Nation's Capital in celebration of her birthday, and in that year she retired from the presidency of the National American Women's Suffrage Association which office she had held for a great number of years.

Susan B. Anthony changed the mind of our Nation. More than anyone of her time she changed the fabric of our civilization by improving the status of women—politically, socially, economically. While she neither began nor ended woman's struggle for equality, she left upon the movement the stamp of an imperishable personality. One might say she is the mother of all enfranchised women in the world today.

An obscure schoolteacher, at the age of 33, she vowed to change the mind of man concerning the degraded position of women. Until the day of her death, she never faltered in her determination to win equality for women.

In her last speech, Miss Anthony left as a memorial to her efforts, the following words of wisdom:

> When will men see that what we ask is not praise but justice?

This last speech concluded with these words: "Failure is impossible."

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, February 15, 1959, marks the 139th anniversary of the birth of Susan B. Anthony. This great lady appropriately may be called an apostle of freedom. She brought to this Nation a vision of a new and enlarged sphere for women in social, economic, and political life. To that cause she unselfishly, effectively, and with rare persistence and ability devoted her life. The years have rewarded her efforts. Her memory and fame have remained through the decades as a symbol of those who have become the common assets of a nation.

I would like to sketch briefly her career and tell you something of the times in which she lived. Susan B. Anthony was born February 15, 1820, in the small New England town of Adams, Mass., where her father owned a cotton mill. Later the family moved to western New York, and in Rochester Susan spent most of her young womanhood and old age.

The Anthonys were people of liberal minds and Susan was given as good an education as girls usually received in those days. This was less than a child now receives in the fifth grade of a public school, and when Susan demanded to be taught long division and algebra she had to find a private tutor.

When she was 17 her father lost all of his property in the panic of 1837. Teaching being the only job open to girls of her social class, Susan became a teacher, and her first indignation against the degraded position of women was when she found that she had to accept $2.50 a week for doing work for which a man was paid $10 a week. She also discovered that the little money she earned was not legally her own, if her father chose to claim it—which happily Mr. Anthony did not. She found when she looked around her that women were practically enslaved. A married woman could own no property, even if it were inherited or a gift. If she worked—and many women did work, sewing, washing and ironing, and taking boarders—her earnings all belonged to her husband. Worse than this, she had no control over her children, for they belonged by law to the father. A married woman could not testify in courts of law, could not sue or be sued. She could not make a will giving away even her personal effects. No woman, married or unmarried, had any way of protesting against such injustice, for women were barred from public platforms.

Susan B. Anthony broke the first taboo by daring to speak at a convention of the New York State Teachers' Association. No woman had ever asked to be heard before, but the men, by a majority of one, voted that she might speak. After that she made speeches advocating the most modern ideas in education, the admission of girls to high school and college, coeducation, promotion of women teachers to higher positions, equal pay for equal work, and, above all, equal educational opportunities for children regardless of sex.

Until she was past 30, educational reform occupied her entire attention outside the schoolroom. But in July 1848 there was a convention in the village of Seneca Falls, N.Y., the first woman's rights convention in the history of the world. Susan did not attend the convention, but she read of it. She saw that what she had to do was to change the mind of the whole Nation in regard to the position of women and bravely she set herself to do it.

Those today who are working for social advances, and who are often weary and heartsick because their ideas are not immediately realized, would do well to study the life of this woman, who never grew weary, never lost faith, never stopped working. At 70 years of age, 75 and 80, and beyond, she continued to travel all over the United States, lecturing, organizing, taking part in every campaign for woman suffrage. She welcomed the four Western States that in her lifetime gave women the vote, but she always believed that woman's enfranchisement should be written into the Constitution of the United States. Toward that end she worked until her death.

Susan B. Anthony's work was not in vain, for 14 years after her death, on August 26, 1920, the 19th amendment was proclaimed in effect.

It is eminently fitting that one from Maryland pay tribute to Susan B. Anthony. Maryland was named for a woman. Her capital city was named for a woman. It was in Maryland in 1649 that Mistress Margaret Brent demanded place and voice in the assembly as the executrix and representative of her kinsman, Lord Baltimore. Her petition was denied, but she must have had some gallant supporters, as Maryland history records that the question of her admission was hotly debated.

It was not until some 200 years later that the demand for full equality for women was made again in Maryland—this time by that peerless leader, Miss Anthony herself, who lectured in Baltimore in the early 1870's. Immediately associations were set up throughout the State to carry on the fight and these groups proved strong factors in the final ratification of the 19th amendment.

In fitting tradition, Maryland takes her rightful place in urging the adoption of the equal rights amendment so that henceforth, women shall have at last, a place and voice; so that henceforth the law of this land shall be, in the immortal words of Susan B. Anthony, "man's rights and nothing more, woman's right and nothing less."

I urge the Members of the 86th Congress to give to the women of this Nation equal opportunity. I have said on the floor of this House previously, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat, that if two-thirds of the House and two-thirds of the Senate approve the equal rights amendment the citizens of our 49 States will have the opportunity to make the final decision by ratification. Approval of 36 States will add to the Constitution an amendment which goes hand in hand with the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights. It will provide that equality of right shall not be denied by the United States or any State on account of sex.

In paying tribute to Susan B. Anthony, I pay tribute to all women. It is an inspiration to all of us, and a refreshing experience, to turn our attention to a woman who did so much to give us the right to call ourselves a democracy. We can do no less than to follow her sound advice.

Mrs. WEIS. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we pause briefly to pay grateful tribute to the memory of one of the great women of American history, Susan B. Anthony, and I would not want the day to pass without adding my own sentiments to those which have already been expressed.

Susan B. Anthony lived the greater part of her life in my home city of Rochester, N.Y., and though it has now been a little over 52 years since her death, I can assure you that her memory continues to burn brightly in the heart of virtually every woman in our community.

Each year numerous women's organizations throughout western New York celebrate the birthday of Susan Anthony, and last week it was my privilege to attend two of these anniversary meetings, one at the restored home of Miss Anthony in Rochester, and the other in Buffalo. I was asked to speak briefly at the meeting in Buffalo, to the women of the Interclub Council of Western New York, and I would like to include portions of my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

THE ROLE OF WOMEN IN A CHANGING WORLD

(Excerpts from speech of Representative JUDY WEIS to Interclub Council of Western New York, Feb. 14, 1959)

Susan Anthony was one of the great dynamic leaders of America, and she possessed in abundance all the great attributes of a crusader. Into her character were woven those traits that triumph over all difficulties and discouragements. A will as stubborn as twisted steel. A determination that scorned denial. A soul sensitive to every injustice and tyranny over mind and soul. A courage that counted no costs. A creed that acknowledged responsibility only to her conscience and her God. In all of American history she has few equals as a moral leader, and in her life and her work there is a wonderful example for all of us.

In the same way that we pause to honor Susan Anthony, it seems to me that it is also important that we pause occasionally to take stock of what women have accomplished in these 52 years since her passing.

They have been truly great years for us, and I think it is encouraging to women everywhere to take a good look at the gains and at the contributions we are making. It is helpful to men, too, to see the increasingly important positions in society which women are successfully filling. It increases their confidence in us, and it opens new opportunities to us.

At the same time, taking a good look at what we have done often serves the equally useful purpose of exposing those areas where we are not doing too terribly well, or where a great deal more remains to be done. I would urge all of you to take a little time out once in a while to reflect seriously on what we have accomplished—and what we have still failed to do. * * * Whenever I think of the strides we have made, I am reminded of a remark which Susan Anthony made almost 100 years ago. "Modern invention," she said, "has banished the spinning wheel, and the same law of progress makes the woman of today a different woman from her grandmother."

Wrapped up in these words of Susan Anthony, and in this fast-growing realization of the potential importance of women is perhaps the greatest of all challenges to us—the challenge of where, and how, we can find our proper place in such a swiftly changing world. * * *

I am inclined to think that in Red China and the Soviet Union the role of women has changed too radically. As someone said not long ago, "Russia has the epitome of equal rights, and women are freely offered equality—in all the hard and unyielding tasks like digging sewers, laying cobblestones and stoking blast furnaces."

But this does not deny the fact that in some areas they are doing wonderfully well—and we are not. Over 70 percent of the doctors in Russia are women, and half of the science students in their universities are women. The percentages in our country are a little pale by comparison. Only 5½ percent of our medical students are women, less than 1 percent of our engineering students are girls, and only 4 percent are studying chemistry and physics. Yet experts unanimously agree that women have as much capacity in all of these fields as men. We are simply not making full use of the great potential that is ours until we move into these areas of endeavor and begin making the contributions of which we are fully capable.

Today, as never before in our history, we are locked in a struggle with an opposing ideology which is using every means at its disposal to overwhelm our way of life. We must answer this challenge in kind, with our total effort of our own. * * *

There is still much to be done if we are to fulfill the role that should be ours in this wonderfully exciting period of history. It will require work and sacrifice, and more work, and it will not be easy. But our battles have never been easy, and as I look into the future, with all its uncertainties, I cannot help but look back over my shoulder occasionally into the past, and what I see there is always heartening.

A hundred years ago, women had no right to higher education, no right to enter the trades and professions, no right to own their own property, no right to vote or hold office. And then a small band of courageous, farsighted women rose up to fight for those things in which they believed. Their names? Carrie Chapman Catt, Lucretia Mott, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony—none of them will be forgotten. And as I look ahead today I can foresee other women by the scores, equally courageous, equally farsighted, taking their places, even as women today are taking their places, and I am confident that, as we have never failed before, we will not fail now.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Nation celebrated the 139th anniversary of the birth of one of our greatest women, Susan B. Anthony.

Since her birth, the status of women in American life, and especially in the political life of the Nation, has been revolutionized. No man or woman in the land played a more vital role in bringing about that revolutionary change than did Susan B. Anthony.

Those of us from western Massachusetts, where in the little town of Adams Susan B. Anthony was born on February 15, 1820, are proud of this native daughter.

As a member of the Massachusetts State Senate, I was pleased to introduce a resolution making August 26, the day that the equal suffrage amendment to the Constitution became law, Susan B.

Anthony Day in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I am indeed thrilled to see here today the tributes being given to our native daughter by Members of the Congress from all parts of the Nation.

We in Massachusetts cannot be selfish about Susan B. Anthony, simply because she was born in our State. Her life was dedicated to the cause of equal suffrage for women throughout America. Her life work has borne fruits in every corner of the globe. For these reasons we are glad to share her memory with all the world.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, this past week, we in the U.S. Congress have been celebrating the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, the emancipator of an entire race. It is fitting that we now pay our tribute in the same way to one who was an emancipator of American women—Susan B. Anthony.

Her birthday is being celebrated February 16 in all parts of the country. Her statue is here in the crypt of our Capitol Building, a gift from American women. The 19th amendment to the Constitution, which enfranchised women, is popular known as the Susan B. Anthony amendment. Every year comes new recognition of what she did to elevate the position of the women in our country.

Suffrage for women is, of course, taken for granted to day—and this is well, for we do not like to recall that our mothers, wives and daughters did not always share with us, their husbands and fathers and sons and brothers, the primary right—and duty—of the franchise. Fortunately man's memory is so constituted that we do take for granted what is obviously right and good.

But the ideal for which Susan B. Anthony and her valiant fellow workers had to struggle so long and so mightily—yes, and to endure sacrifices and ridicule and indignity—is not yet realized. We here have the power to complete the task and to erase the blot which makes half our Nation not equal under the law. Let us complete the task now, and within a short time—I feel confident—it will be taken for granted that in the United States all citizens are equal under the law.

On the anniversary of the birth of Susan B. Anthony 200 Members of the House of Representatives announced publicly their intention to carry to a conclusion, as far as Congress can do so, the work to which Susan B. Anthony devoted her life efforts by giving their support to the equal rights for women amendment introduced by the Honorable KATHARINE ST. GEORGE and 38 other Members. There is no better way in which to bring our tribute to Susan B. Anthony.

RE-REFERENCE OF H.R. 1341

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H.R. 1341, which was previously referred to the Committee on Government Operations, be re-referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

REPEAL OF EXCISE TAX ON TELEPHONE SERVICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced legislation to provide a termination date of the excise tax on telephone service.

This bill is identical to the bill introduced by the Honorable THOMAS P. O'NEILL of Massachusetts, whose permission I have to join him in sponsoring the termination of this unfair tax.

Last year I introduced a bill to do away with the telephone tax altogether, but the bill was not considered and will not be considered this year because of the need for revenue. Instead of trying to terminate it this year we are trying to propose a termination date of June 30, 1960, in order to search for other sources of revenue to replace the revenue unfairly collected from telephone users. I say "unfairly" because of matters hereinafter outlined.

During World War II this telephone tax was imposed on the Nation's telephone users. It was designed to reduce the traffic load on telephone plants overburdened by wartime calls, and to discourage new service that would necessitate installing critical new equipment. It was supposed to be a temporary tax.

World War II has been over for nearly 14 years. New equipment and services have been available for much of that time. But the tax still stands, a monument to emergency, and a millstone around the collective necks of telephone users which includes practically everybody.

To the customer, the tax represents a 10 percent higher monthly telephone bill.

To the Government the tax represents another convenient access to the public pocketbook, disguised as higher telephone rates; a mask that most customers do not recognize even though it is itemized on their bills.

To the company, the tax represents money it must collect at its own expense for the Federal Government.

The tax is unfair to every user of the telephone. It is discriminatory. There is no such tax on any of the other public utilities—electric, gas, or water. It puts an essential public service in the same class as jewelry, perfume, and entertainment.

An effort has been made to obtain repeal of the tax for years. Many bills have been introduced in Congress. Failing to keep faith with the public, the Federal Government is going to consider offering as much as 40 percent of the telephone tax revenue to the States for financing vocational schools and sewage treatment.

If Congress passes this measure, and if it should be accepted by the State legislatures, the discriminatory telephone tax likely will be with us forever, past all hope of repeal.

Once a new tax is instituted, history shows that it dies hard, because the money has become a permanent part of the budget, even though the original need for it has passed.

Certainly there are better ways for defraying the cost of vocational schools and sewage treatment than by imposing part of the burden on a particular part of the tax-paying public—the telephone users.

The entire communications industry has urged the elimination of these taxes at every opportunity. Representatives of the United States Independent Telephone Association and of the Bell System have testified before congressional committees. Industry witnesses have taken the position that while the Government need for revenue must be recognized, this discriminatory tax imposed to meet a national emergency, should be eliminated just as soon as Government revenue requirements permit. At the same time, the question remains whether a tax so discriminatory as the telephone excise tax should be continued in lieu of obtaining needed revenue from other tax sources.

Congress having repealed the excise tax on the transportation of goods in 1958, communications and the transportation of persons—where the cost of the fare is 60 cents or more—remain the only services now subject to excise taxes. There is danger that these remaining taxes will become permanent unless Congress acts to prevent it.

The Joint Federal-State Action Committee proposal that 40 percent of the local telephone tax be turned over to the States emphasizes the danger of the tax becoming permanent. The proposal overlooks, first, that the local telephone tax was a wartime emergency tax; second, that no excise tax was ever imposed upon local telephone service until required by World War II; and third, that this would in effect saddle upon the telephone user the costs of vocational training and new waste disposal plants in all States—costs that should be borne by all taxpayers just as other expenses of Government are.

Telephone customers carry a big telephone taxload even without the excise tax. For instance, in 1957 the Bell System alone paid $1.3 billion in operating taxes and collected directly from telephone users about $515 million more in excise taxes on the services they used. This totals more than $51 per customer per year. Without the excise tax, telephone users would seem to be carrying their full share of the tax burden.

If this iniquitous levy were eliminated, the telephone user would get the full benefit because the telephone company acts merely as a collection agent for the Federal Government—at the customer's expense. If the tax were eliminated the customer would ultimately benefit in another way, namely, from the saving on collection expense which must necessarily become a part of the cost of service.

For these reasons it is natural that telephone companies object to these Federal excise taxes. They do so for three good reasons: First, a company has a responsibility to object to unequal and discriminating taxes levied on its customers; second, excise taxes increase materially the cost of telephone service to customers, and may well curtail their use of telephone service which automatically reduces the value of telephone service to existing customers; third, administering the collection of excise taxes adds an additional amount to the cost of telephone service.

Telephone users are unhappy about having to pay excise taxes on their service. Testimony indicating just how unhappy telephone users are about this tax has been offered before the House Ways and Means Committee by representatives of such organizations as the American Hotel Association, United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association, New York Stock Exchange, American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners, the United States Independent Telephone Association, and the Bell System.

The State and Federal regulatory agencies strenuously oppose excise taxes on communication services for a variety of reasons, the chief one being that the tax makes it difficult to set fair rates for services. At its 1958 convention, the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners unanimously petitioned the Congress to terminate the discriminatory excise taxes on communications and transportation services at the earliest possible date.

To sum up, there are three basic reasons why excises on communications services should be repealed:

First. The longer they are continued the greater the danger that they will become a permanent part of the tax structure, which was never intended by the Congress that put them in effect.

Second. They are unfair and discriminatory against telephone users as a group. Telephone service is regarded as a daily necessity. Yet Congress treats it as a luxury by subjecting it to the same taxes that are imposed on unnecessary luxuries such as club dues, night club bills, liquor and tobacco. It is the only household utility service so taxed.

Third. The necessity for maintaining Federal tax revenues at the current high levels should not preclude the elimination of these taxes on communications services, so vital and essential in the everyday life of most Americans.

The nature of the tax demands its early repeal or at least the immediate adoption of a firm termination date.

I quote an article from the Telephone News issue of December 1958, which I think is significant:

FIFTEEN-DOLLAR FEDERAL LICENSE FEE FOR TELEPHONE USERS?—OUR CUSTOMERS ARE ALREADY PAYING IT

Suppose the Federal Government passed a law making every telephone customer pay $15 a year for a license to use his telephone.

Farfetched? Not at all. Telephone subscribers across the Nation already pay this average sum each year for the privilege of making local and long-distance calls.

Of course, telephone users do not receive licenses for their money. The fee is paid in excise taxes—10 percent of the amounts paid for all local and long-distance service. Business houses, manufacturers and other large telephone users pay thousands of dollars in excise taxes annually.

Our companies collect the money and pass it along to the Federal Government. None of it ever comes back as direct benefits to our companies or our customers.

The excise tax on telephone service was inaugurated as a temporary, emergency measure. During World War II it served two purposes: to raise revenue and to discourage the use of service which could not be expanded to meet civilian demand.

The war emergency has passed. The civilian demand has long since ceased to interfere with military needs. The temporary excise tax remains.

The tax is unfair, discriminatory and unrealistic. It penalizes one segment of the public; it singles out the telephone from other household utilities—gas, water and electricity—which have no such tax; and it is imposed much in the same way as the tax on luxuries—liquor, jewelry, furs and night clubs.

The tax is an unwarranted burden on our subscribers, and regardless of whether it costs a customer thousands of dollars, $15 or even $1, we believe it is unfair and we oppose it.

And now comes a new and more harmful proposal. The Joint Federal-State Action Committee proposes that part of this tax burdening the telephone user—40 percent of the amount levied on local telephone service—be handed over to the States. The States, thus subsidized by the telephone user, would be required to devote these funds to the erection of sewage disposal plants and for vocational training. The balance of the excise taxes on telephone service would still remain in the Federal tax structure.

This proposal would in effect make this unfair, discriminatory tax a permanent part of the States' tax laws. In such circumstances the possibility of repealing any part of the telephone excise tax would seem remote.

Our customers justly resent this unfair tax on their telephone service and should have the facts to carry their case effectively to the State and national lawmakers. And each of us owes it to our customers, neighbors and friends to give them these facts that are so vital to their pocketbooks.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot urge too strongly the early consideration of this legislation, the enactment of which is long overdue.

THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLIKEN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, the Tennessee Valley Authority has recently announced its approval of the purchase of the Nation's biggest steam turbine generator from an English manufacturer. This is not an ordinary, everyday decision by our Government. It is a precedent-setting and, I believe, shortsighted and dangerous action.

For some years our Government has been buying an increasing amount of electrical equipment abroad—simply because the very low wages of foreign workmen makes possible much lower prices on this custom-built heavy electrical apparatus. But never before had our Government purchased a steam turbine generator—the key unit of an electric power system—from abroad. Now, for the first time, the U.S. Government has taken this step, and in so doing, has bought the Nation's biggest steam turbine generator in history.

Why do I say this is dangerous policy? Because this is just one more step—and the biggest step yet—toward making this Nation's vital electric power system dependent upon a foreign country for maintenance and repair.

Power generators are not quickly replaceable or repairable. They are giant machines bigger than a house and extremely complicated in their design and manufacture. They are not alike, in that each one is specially built to meet the specific needs of its user. Their maintenance, in peace or war, requires ready access to the manufacturing plant of the builder and technical consultation service of his engineers without dependence on ocean transportation. To buy key machines of this type for vital national defense power needs—as in the TVA area—is to utterly disregard the hazards involved. It is most significant that the English, with a government-owned electric power system, do not buy such power generators from foreign firms as a matter of policy, for this very reason of their national security. Yet there are many in this country who weep for the British if anyone suggests that the United States should show equal intelligence.

Why do I say that this action is not only dangerous, but also shortsighted? I refer to the effect on our own economy. This single order for a 500,000-kilowatt steam turbine generator represents 1,080,000 man-hours of work which will be lost to the employees of the low U.S. bidder. The low U.S. bidder in this case, after TVA evaluated the base bids, was the Westinghouse Electric Corp. I note that the General Electric Co. claims to be the low American bidder, but the Washington office of TVA states that when the bids were evaluated by TVA in terms of the specifications, Westinghouse Electric was lower than General Electric. This means that if there had been no lower foreign bid, Westinghouse would have been awarded this contract. The lost order represents, in addition, 375,000 man-hours of work lost to hundreds of Westinghouse suppliers. All of this is enough work for 700 people for a full year. And this is a time when employment is seriously curtailed in the American plants which make heavy electrical apparatus, such as those of Westinghouse in Lester, Delaware County, Pa., and in East Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DENT. I want to note at this point that I agree with everything the gentleman has said so far and probably will with everything else he says. I am glad he is joining in this fight, because not alone are we buying from England, but just as late as last week we purchased or gave a letter of intent to purchase steam generators from a Swiss company known as Brown-Boveri, which will replace work intended for the Elliott Corp. in Jeannette, Pa., a plant now operating at 40 percent of capacity. All of this, I might say, is the direct result of the President's Executive order in 1954 which wiped out the 25 percent differential previously allowed under our trade agreements with European competitors for public business, and he reduced it to 6 percent, which does not even cover the cost of Government mandated additions, such as the Workmen's Compensation Act, the Social Security Act, as well as the other mandated costs that we, as a government have placed against the American producers. I join the gentleman in the fight he is making.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

These are labor depressed areas. Many of the workmen affected by this loss of work have as much as 17 years seniority on their jobs.

Is this situation the fault of the Westinghouse Co. or of the 700 employees who may be thrown out of work? Indeed it is not. The difference in bid prices between Westinghouse Co. and the C. A. Parsons Co. of England is the direct result of the wide wage differentials which exist between England and the United States and which our laws help maintain. The average English wage rates are only 37 percent of U.S. wage rates. American manufacturers cannot possibly compete on heavy, custom-built electrical apparatus with its high labor content, against English prices. They cannot compete, that is, unless our Government gets smart enough to consider not just price, but also the other vitally important considerations on which there is no price. I mean the jobs of American workmen and the security of the Nation itself.

This is neither the time nor the place for bargain-basement buying or price-tag politics. But for the benefit of those who are genuinely concerned about the rising cost of government, as am I, let me point out that the lower foreign price in this case should be viewed in light of what this country will lose in tax revenues by placing this order abroad. It will cost the United States about $3,600,000 in lost tax revenues to both the Federal and the State governments. This loss will eat up most of the so-called saving to the Government through the lower foreign price which is made possible by cheap labor.

Mr. Speaker, if one were to disregard all I have said up to this point, there is another most important consideration weighing heavily in favor of buying such power generators as those from domestic manufacturers. That is simply the many advantages to TVA or whatever other Government agency may be the purchaser. In this important matter of maintenance, for example, the Westinghouse Co. has a technical organization for service and repair which includes more than 1,000 field service engineers. In contrast, Parsons has three technical men in Canada and is dependent on service and parts from England—service and parts that could be cut off entirely in case of war.

In the matter of the technical differences between the products of the two firms, Westinghouse has built turbine generators which operate at higher temperatures and pressures than do the Parsons generators. For example, Westinghouse is now building a 325,000-kilowatt machine to operate at 3,600 revolutions per minute, while Parsons' largest machine is a 120,000 kilowatt generator operating at 3,000 r.p.m. Also, the Westinghouse bid in this instance guaranteed 13,000 kilowatts over the Parsons bid guarantee. One must seriously question, therefore, whether foreign manufacturers are as well qualified to design and build a giant half-million kilowatt generator as are American firms which have led the world in such research, development, and construction and who back up their work with firm performance guarantees.

All of this casts even greater importance on a petition now awaiting decision by the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization. This petition, supported by the National Electrical Manufacturers Association, asks that four major elements of electric power systems be listed as defense essential, and that import of these specific products be restricted in the national interest. This would not apply to most of the electrical industry's products—just four in the heavy power apparatus category.

Since other nations which are capable of manufacturing their own heavy power equipment consider it unwise to use foreign-made machines of this type in their power systems, our own Government should have no hesitancy in following a similar course. Common sense dictates such action. To follow an opposite policy in the name of better international relations is to badly confuse the issue and to appear naive in the eyes of our more realistic friends abroad.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I desire to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks, and very emphatically, representing a district in which the turbine manufacturing facilities of the General Electric Co. are located. While we may differ, and there seems to be some question of difference as to who was the lowest domestic bidder in connection with the TVA contract, I think we certainly agree on the point the gentleman has made.

I should like to urge the gentleman to associate himself with a request I have directed to Governor Hoegh of the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization requesting him to examine this contract and determine whether for reasons of national security he has the right to recommend that it be disallowed. It is my understanding that that question is currently under consideration by the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization. I would hope that the gentleman and his associates on his side of the aisle might use their influence at the other end of the Avenue so that we could establish the principle of domestic purchases for facilities on this important national security project.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I thank the gentleman. I certainly agree that these heavy electric giant hearts of powerplants should be bought in America.

SAM RAYBURN AND JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., RECEIVE TWIN SILVER QUILL AWARDS OF NATIONAL BUSINESS PUBLICATIONS, INC.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, at the Sheraton-Park Hotel in Washington, D.C., on January 23, the Senate majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, presented twin 1958 Silver Quill Awards of National Business Publications—highest tribute of the business press—to the Speaker of the House, SAM RAYBURN, and its former Speaker, JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., for "distinguished legislative service to business and industry."

This annual Washington dinner features a question-and-answer period in which captains of industry, Cabinet officers, and other Government leaders gage the state of the Nation by discussing the prospects in their respective areas of the economy.

National Business Publications is an association of publishers of 203 technical, professional, industrial, scientific, merchandising, and marketing magazines.

Business Publications perform a unique service to the economy. They facilitate the exchange of business education and industrial know-how. They stimulate our enterprise. They power the progress of our technology.

The excerpts follow:

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MASTER OF CEREMONIES RICHARD P. SMITH, PRESIDENT, W. R. C. SMITH PUBLISHING CO., AND CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, NATIONAL BUSINESS PUBLICATIONS, INC.

It is always our hope that this state of the Nation dinner will prove to be a harbinger of better times to come. Here—at our head tables—are leaders from government and industry who have graciously consented to answer one specific question related to our dinner theme, "A Platform for Business in a Space-Age Economy." All have agreed to operate under a tight 2-minute rule.

We are also privileged tonight by the presence at our podium of a famous news analyst, commentator, and correspondent. He has courteously consented to be our moderator and will ask the questions which are to be answered. It is my good fortune to be the one to present to you Mr. Walter Cronkite.

"REMARKS BY WALTER CRONKITE, NEWS COMMENTATOR, COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM

"Good evening ladies and gentlemen. Mister SAM, Senator JOHNSON, Speaker JOE—and other members of this very distinguished company—I am highly honored to be a part of this truly significant occasion. I want to thank an old friend, your president, Bob Harper, for making it possible. Answers to our questions follow in the order listed in your program. I will initiate each question by simply announcing the name of the speaker. So, now, on the beam of our theme, "A Platform for Business in a Space-Age Economy," we begin with Mr. Rogers:

" 'State of Nation questions and answers

" 'William P. Rogers, the Attorney General

" 'Question. Mr. Attorney General, in considering the possibility of future political action by the business community, now that organized labor has become such a major factor in politics, wouldn't it be more equitable to amend the Corrupt Practices Act, so that the American investor could become more active in political campaigns through those organizations in which he is a stockholder?

" 'Answer. Walter, I'm not sure why you ask me this question. Due to certain unfortunate developments last fall, we Republicans don't have much to say about changing the laws.

""The suggestion, in the question, that the business community should take a more active part in political affairs to offset union activities, I think, is the wrong emphasis. I firmly believe that the business community should take a more active part in political affairs, but for an entirely different reason. No group in this country has a greater stake in the future of our country than the business community, and, by taking a more active part, they can contribute very significantly to the future of our country. So, I am thoroughly in accord with more activity on the part of the business community.

""Now, specifically addressing myself to the question, let me say that the Corrupt Practices Act is misunderstood by a lot of people. I doubt if many people have actually read it. There probably are not as many changes, as you might think, that can be made in the law, on a superficial reading of it. But, in order to avoid the suggestion that might come to your mind that I don't think there are things that can be done to improve the law, I want to say right away that that is not the case and there may be some ways that the law can be strengthened.

""To be sure that you direct your interest and energy in the right direction I, in closing, would like to suggest that, if you do have a feeling that there are specific changes that should be made in the law, you send your letters to LYNDON JOHNSON. Thank you.

" 'Herman K. Intemann, President Union Carbide Metals Co.

" 'Question. Mr. Intemann, in the all-out race to conquer outer space, are you satisfied that we are blessed with sufficient resources—in the way of essential fuels, minerals and metals—to assure future successful competition by our related industries with those formidable space-age developments already being forecast by other major world-power nations?

" 'Answer. The natural resources of this Nation have long supplied an economy that has produced the highest living standard in the world and has accomplished the greatest technological progress man has ever seen. These resources, with respect to fuels, minerals, and metals, are ample to take care of outer space needs in the foreseeable future. We're not yet talking about a space rocket in every garage or an automobile type of mass production operation that consumes vast amounts of materials. The real problem is not one of sufficient quantity of natural resources, but the conversion of these resources to chemical and metallurgical materials which give optimum performance under the unusual conditions that exist in space. Research in industry, government and the academic world has virtually accomplished miracles in the past and can be counted on to meet successfully this challenge.

" 'Ezra Taft Benson, Secretary of Agriculture

" 'Question. Mr. Secretary Benson, it is obvious, of course, that—if we are to reap the harvest of outer space supremacy—we must sow the fields of our enterprise with ever-increasing expenditures for the required equipment and allied developments. Without impairing our vital food and fiber supply—how much money can we safely cut from our regular appropriations for carrying on the business of agriculture?

" 'Answer. The answer to your question is twofold. First, the amount requested for agriculture in the President's budget is a minimum needed under present laws to carry out the required functions of this Department. The President is striving for a balanced budget in 1960 and the Department of Agriculture's budget reflects a sincere effort to do our part.

" 'Secondly, under the terms of existing legislation (which is outmoded and unrealistic in this day of tremendous agricultural efficiency and production), we are required to provide price supports to farmers on a few crops, 12 out of 250. With mandatory supports at high, unrealistic levels and with crop production setting new records, these outlays have become tremendous. If Congress will take a hard, realistic look at the price-support programs and act at once, we can substantially reduce these costs. This will not impair our vital food and fiber supply and will improve the economic health not only of our farmers and ranchers but of our whole Nation.

" 'Under these old depression-war-born laws, surplus is built up. Markets have been lost. Controls have failed and costs to taxpayers have risen. Farmers need and want freedom to plant, freedom to market, freedom to compete, and freedom from Government regulation and control.

" 'John R. Kimberly, Chairman and President, Kimberly-Clark Corp.

" 'Question. Mr. Kimberly, handicapped as we now seem to be—with spiraling wages, prices, and taxes already pricing us out of world markets, all the way from Scandinavia to Latin America—are you inclined to agree with the prediction that unless we find a way to stabilize production and distribution costs, we can easily become a nation forced to ration even such desirable daily customs as coffee-drinking?

" 'Answer. Yes; I do agree that we must find a way to stabilize costs if we are to maintain our leadership in economic development. This is vital not only to maintain and expand our world markets but to keep our domestic economy in a strong, competitive position and avoid further inflation.

" 'Under our present program of gradual tariff reductions and the development of common markets abroad, industry in this country must find new ways of increasing its efficiency and real productivity. Our goods and services must be leaders in quality and have a value in the market that not only maintains existing customers but develops new ones.

" 'The alternative would be to drop our standard of living to equal that of our competitors. This can be avoided, if we are willing to face up to the fact that industry can finance future development in terms of research for new products and capital expenditures for their production only out of earnings.

" 'If the tax burden on business could be brought down and an opportunity provided for increased incentive in the form of earnings, I believe we can hold down inflation and, at the same time, improve real wages and, through increases in volume, maintain government revenues.

" 'We must seek out and welcome innovation in our approach to our economic development. This is the responsibility of all of us in industry and in government.

" 'Wilber M. Brucker, Secretary of the Army

" 'Question. Mr. Secretary Brucker, it has always been said that a good offense is the best defense. Why, then, should we expend so much money and effort on defensive weapons and equipment? Wouldn't it be better to concentrate our resources on the development of offensive power?

" 'Answer. Mr. Cronkite and good friends. This matter of discussing offense and defense and all of the military, in 2 minutes, is about like asking Einstein to talk about relativity and the theory of it. I want to assure you tonight that there's no truth to the rumor that the Navy and the Air Force have donated their time to the Secretary of the Army for this purpose. You may think that this has been a great night, tonight, but I've spent 2 days, yesterday and today, before the Senate Armed Services Committee defending the Army's budget. So, I'm qualified to speak about defense tonight.

" 'Now, to get into this job. The word is balance—forces must never get out of balance. It's just like a football team. If you've got a good backfield with a weak line, you'll never get anywhere or, vice versa, if you've got a weak backfield and a strong line, you'll always lose. We've got to pay attention to both the backfield and the line—it's a question of sheer balance in the spending for national defense. Now, this goes the whole gamut. There's never been a weapon, since the time of the bow and arrow and the spear down to the missile and the intercontinental ballistic missile and the anti-missile missile, never a one, that couldn't be countered and defended against with something else. It's always a contest—manpower against weapons, submarines against torpedoes, divisions against artillery, anti-missiles against missiles, airplanes against antiaircraft artillery or surface-to-air missiles and so forth. It's a question simply of proper balance.

" 'In this country, at the present time, we're open to attack. Not because we want to be but because in conscience and good principle this country can never strike a first blow. In that situation the whole thing becomes topsy-turvy. Instead of talking about offense, we have to start with a strong defense, in order to make possible the raising of SAC from the ground and getting the rest of our offense on the move. So, in talking about either offense or defense, you switch sides very, very rapidly. But, again when we talk about defense and offense, we must remember that we have, in this world, 43 allies with whom we are very closely related. They're all around the world. They extend from Europe to the Far East and to the reaches of Australia—and they're our friends. They're our best help overseas. Our divisions, our planes, and our ships are, of course, of assistance to them out there, and they to us. So, they become not only a defensive weapon at home but an offensive weapon, as an ally, to us here.

" 'In this great moving spectacle of defense this country must, tonight, visualize the coming of whatever may happen. A strong defense and a strong offense are like the prizefighter in the ring. The fellow who sticks his chin out but has no defense had better watch out, even though he's got a wallop in both the right and left. Tonight balance is the word our country needs—balance in defense, manpower, weapons, planes, ships, and guns.

" 'Edmond H. Leavey, President, International Telephone & Telegraph Corp.

" 'Question. Mr. Leavey, we are told that astronautical communications are already a problem of major magnitude, due to congestion of the radio spectrum and a lack of regulations for space-age situations. Will you give us a few hints of things to come in space communications and possible future commercial application of these developments?

" 'Answer. Major problems of space communications are not attributable to spectrum congestion and lack of regulations alone. Other difficulties are posed by the extreme distances involved, power limitations, characteristics of the earth's atmosphere and space, and the present limited payloads of space vehicles.

" 'Nevertheless, we believe that worldwide communications employing space satellites can certainly be a reality, although it will take a major effort. Many years of operational experience with satellite links will be required before complete global communications by this means will be perfected.

" 'In the industry for which I am speaking, many plans are being suggested. For example, ITT laboratories for some time has been studying a global system using stationary satellites. It would work this way: Three satellites would be put into equatorial orbit at approximately 24,000 miles from the earth, circling it every 24 hours, so that the positions of the satellites relative to the earth would remain fixed.

" 'By placing the satellites at equal distance about the orbit and equipping each with a microwave receiver and transmitter, line-of-sight microwave communications would be possible throughout the world except for minor polar areas.

" 'Direct dial telephoning around the world would then be possible. Television programs could be beamed to the world. Communications facilities would thus be available via the satellites.

" 'The problem of congestion in the radio spectrum which was raised in your question, is under study by experts in this field and the outlook for a solution is most encouraging. Final allocation of frequencies will be determined, of course, by international agreements.

" 'We believe a global satellite communications system is within reach and that it can be a powerful weapon for peace.

" 'James H. Douglas, Secretary of the Air Force

" 'Question. Mr. Secretary Douglas, some experts maintain that missiles have already caused the obsolescence of man-piloted aircraft as a weapon of future warfare. If that contention is correct, would it not result in much less cost to the American taxpayer, if we could either have only one military service or let qualified civilian personnel run the missile program?

" 'Answer. First, I must disagree with the experts if they think that manned aircraft will not play an important part in future warfare. I believe that for years to come there will be a firm requirement for long-range bombers, for long-range piloted interceptors and for tactical fighter aircraft. Missiles will replace substantial numbers of our aircraft, but missiles and manned aircraft will supplement each other. The manned bomber will receive great assistance from the long-range ballistic missile in its task of penetrating enemy defenses. It is also becoming a platform for missiles. What we are seeking is the most effective mix of missiles and manned aircraft.

" 'I disagree with the suggestion that manned aircraft are obsolescent, but this position should not dismiss the question, Can we get adequate defense for less cost, whether by one military service or by having civilian personnel run the missile program? In my opinion, the defense enterprise is too big for one military service and the defense reorganization makes clear the authority of the Secretary of Defense to avoid wasteful duplication in missile and other weapon systems programs. As to civilian personnel, I would say the missile programs are under teams that represent military-civilian partnerships. The Air Force ballistic missile program, which I believe has been outstandingly successful, is a good example. There the Ballistic Missile Division, under General Schriever, depends upon more than 500 civilian scientists and technicians for systems engineering and technical direction of our ballistic missile programs.

" 'To the extent that the question suggests the need to press ahead as advancing technology permits and keep our forces modern, let me assure you this is the purpose of the Air Force. To maintain the military strength that is our best assurance of peace, we are aggressively developing the weapons of tomorrow and bringing them into our inventory to replace weapons of the past at the earliest time consistent with maintaining ready reliable forces.

" 'H. M. Horner, Chairman, United Aircraft Corp.

" 'Question. Mr. Horner, are you convinced that American industry can assume the job—with qualified personnel, modern laboratories and factories, and sufficient tools—to research, manufacture and maintain all necessary space-age "hardware" and supporting facilities, at a lower cost to the taxpayer than it can be done if researched and produced exclusively by the Government in facities completely owned by the Government?

" 'Answer. Yes, with these explanations. In a field as dynamic as flight—whether it is in the earth's own atmosphere or in space itself—there will be the constant need for complex research, development and production facilities. There will always be the need for personnel that is steadily abreast of the expanding arts and sciences, trained to increase their dimensions. So, up-to-date facilities and technically skilled manpower will be an unceasing requirement, no matter who undertakes the job. This has been so in aviation since Kitty Hawk and it will continue to be, so long as we seek to improve the dimensions of flight.

" 'Some Government support for facilities traditionally has supplemented the engineering and production facilities of industry for such complex and costly vehicles as advanced fighters, bombers, missiles, and rockets. The very nature of their conception and realization, together with many other factors, has required such assistance. A better technical and less expensive job can be done, however, for the whole range of space flight, if the assignment is placed with industry. It can be done far more rapidly, too—and time, in my opinion, is the most important qualification of all. Among many reasons I could advance to support my position for industry, perhaps the most prosaic is the most telling. This country has always operated with pretty good success by using the competitive system. We know that system, so why should we throw it over for a way of operation that has proven inferior and in which our chief competitor has a 40-year start?

" 'If American industry is given the job in the proper climate, we can lead the world in the space age. American industry proved its ability to perform these complex technological tasks by giving this country the finest overall Air Force the world has ever known during World War II. It is the competitive drive of our system of private industry that is all important. Moreover, if all research, development and production are lodged in the Government itself, then the customer is also the developer and producer. Would this customer, who is also the developer, readily admit that a good job was not being done? Most Americans, I think, would have a two-word description for the condition—not good.

" 'Lewis L. Strauss, Secretary of Commerce

" 'Question. Mr. Secretary Strauss, as head of the businessman's department of Government, do you consider it probable that the very nature of our future economy could adversely affect private enterprise—by prompting more and more participation by Federal agencies in the actual business of producing and providing many of the items required for space age progress?

" 'Answer. I would expect the reverse. I believe private competitive enterprise will play an increasingly greater role. We will not make what you have called space-age progress by resorting to State-dominated collectivism. The Government can only enter the business of production in competition with its citizens at the expense of progress.

" 'We are on the threshold of a new decade during which our population should grow from 180 million next year to 214 million in 1970. Invention and innovation will supply increasing needs and provide new products for our more numerous, continuously better educated and more prosperous consuming public. Only the forward thrust of a free economic system can develop velocity for the anticipated record-breaking prosperity and for our national security.

" 'Even the massive research and giant production, required by government for nuclear space-age progress, stem in greatest measure from individual ingenuity and from contracting with private business.

" 'If the American goals continue to be both scientific preeminence and individual liberty, our perfected instrument for their attainment will be free enterprise, encouraged by a sagacious government but operated by resourceful private citizens in the common interest of everyone.

" 'A. King McCord, President, Westinghouse Air Brake Co.

" 'Question. Mr. McCord, do you believe that our national security can be served better by additional foreign aid in the way of investment overseas by American private capital—to further the free-enterprise system abroad—or by private domestic educational programs designed to achieve greater public recognition of the benefits and efficiencies of the American free enterprise system?

" 'Answer. My belief is that our national security can be served better by private domestic educational programs of the type described by the question, rather than by additional overseas investment by private American capital.

" 'This position is taken with full recognition that investment of American private capital abroad is important to our mutual security program and, as such, contributes to the strengthening of national security.

" 'However, the question requires that I select one of two alternatives or, at the least, express an opinion as to a priority of action.

" 'National security, I believe, rests upon the foundation of an efficient and expanding free-enterprise system at home. To maintain our system and permit it to reach its greatest potential requires continuing and aggressive public support. Such support, from an informed public, will result in more efficient individual effort and be reflected in a political climate which continues to support the free-enterprise system and encourage the expansion of our economy.

" 'As the free-enterprise system continues to succeed here, in that degree, it should and will compel imitation abroad. If it fails here or does not continue as the system of greatest economic promise, then no amount of investment abroad or foreign aid will persuade recipient peoples to follow our example.

" 'Obliged to choose between the two alternatives, I am compelled to favor education at home over investment abroad because acceptance of our free-enterprise system abroad depends upon its success at home.

" 'Arthur E. Summerfield, the Postmaster General

" 'Question. Mr. Postmaster General, with all of the planning and projecting of missile missions to the moon and back and elsewhere in outer space—as part of your modernization program—are you contemplating delivery of mail to foreign countries and to space stations throughout the universe via red, white, and blue rockets?

" 'Answer. Walter, if I did not know you better I could suggest you had your tongue in your cheek when you asked me that question.

" 'Seriously, however, your question reminds me of a famous prediction which was made nearly a hundred years before the Wright brothers flew the first airplane at Kitty Hawk.

" 'In his immortal poem, "Locksley Hall," Alfred Lord Tennyson made this observation:

" ' "For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be:

" ' "Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails, Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales."

" 'Not many of us have the eloquence or great vision of Alfred Lord Tennyson, but this I can say—we stand today on the threshold of the greatest peaceful use of missile development, the transmission of mail between the peoples of the world by guided missile.

" 'Let me assure you, Walter, that the peaceful use of guided missiles for transmission of mail is presently under serious study by the Post Office Department.

" 'The postal service will continue to keep pace with the great scientific achievements which are being made. Wherever our citizens may go in this great universe, the delivery of their mail will continue to be expedited whether they are on the moon or on a space station, or in the far corners of the earth.

" 'In my judgment, before man reaches the moon, your mail will be delivered within hours from New York to California, to England, to India, or to Australia by guided missiles.

" 'And if Congress provides us with sufficient funds, you may be assured that mail-carrying rocket missiles will be painted with the traditional colors—red, white, and blue—of which every American is justly proud.

" 'Harllee Branch, Jr., President, the Southern Co.

" 'Question. Mr. Branch, by constantly increasing the availability of loans to foreign countries for developmental projects, at the current annual rate of some $700 million, isn't it conceivable that we are really only creating a Frankenstein in the market by way of self-financed competition for our own manufacturers?

" 'Answer. I think the word "Frankenstein" is too strong. It suggests an uncontrollable monster which turns on and destroys its creator. I do not think that loans to foreign countries for developmental projects, if prudently and realistically granted, are uncontrollable competition for American manufacturers.

" 'Certainly, these loan programs must be realistically geared, not only to the economic needs and desires of the borrowers, but also to the ability of our people to provide the loans without seriously impairing our own economic strength and stability. There is a limit in this respect which cannot be ignored.

" 'Assuming that our foreign loan programs are skillfully managed, then we must be concerned with other governmental programs which tend to hobble the competitive capacity of American industry. My primary concern is—I think—with a tax-depreciation program which discourages the prompt replacement of obsolete industrial equipment with the most modern and efficient apparatus which our scientific and engineering skills can make available.

" 'I am also concerned with labor and tariff policies which impair the ability of American manufacturers to compete on even terms with foreign manufacturers—even in American markets. And, of course, I am concerned—as every American should be—with the specter of inflation and with any governmental policy—whether related to foreign loans or domestic spending—which tends to fuel the inflationary spiral.

" 'What I am trying to say is this—a foreign loan program, if realistically and prudently managed, is not likely, of itself, to create a "Frankenstein" for our people. But, such a program, if conducted in an irresponsible fashion and if coupled with other reckless and profligate domestic programs, could produce such a result. All of these things are, in my opinion, controllable. The question is whether the American people and their elected leaders have the will and wisdom to exercise the realistic control.

" 'Wm. McC. Martin, Jr., Chairman, Federal Reserve System

" 'Question. Mr. Chairman, due no doubt to our loss last year of over $2 billion in gold, plus continued deficit spending to the tune of $12 billion—we hear disturbing reports about a growing distrust around the world for future stability of the American dollar. Can we continue on our current financial course, without losing face both as a fiscal and as a moral force?

" 'Answer. My own experience in this connection indicates that the doubts of our friends abroad relate not to this country's ability but to its will and moral stamina; overcoming these doubts, therefore, requires continuingly responsible conduct of our affairs rather than a flurry of dramatic actions.

" The problem can be stated simply: If American goods are priced out of world markets, the result will be a decline in business and employment at home, attended by great social hardship and a weakening of our position in world affairs, attended by vulnerability to hostile forces.

" 'Fortunately, the solution is equally simple to state: The first requirement is that we balance our budget and keep our financial house in order, which means we must pay for the national needs expressed in the budget instead of giving IOU's or printing more paper dollars and thus driving prices up; the second requirement is that we increase our productivity and pass benefits therefrom to the consumer, thus raising our standard of living and fostering economic growth on a sustainable base. The way is clear. The will must be shown.

" ' Russell R. De Young, President, Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

" 'Question. Mr. De Young, your company has just recently evidenced full faith in the future of our economy by embarking on its greatest expansion program. Isn't it only fair to assume that you cannot anticipate a realistic return on your investment in tomorrow—without the Government matching your confidence by providing adequate legislative and administrative protection for your continued right to compete in a free market?

" 'Answer. We have never been more confident in what the future holds for American industry than we are today.

" 'Goodyear is planning a capital expenditure this year of $70 million as evidence of our faith in a sound recovery of the American economy.

" 'Our partners in this investment are the American people. They are represented, in part, by over 100,000 employees and their families, our stockholders, our labor leaders, our suppliers, and our customers. Their stake in this investment is just as great as ours.

" 'And, under our system of government, these people—and their counterparts in every industry in the country—are the Government * * * and we have confidence in these people.

" 'Business today represents the many—not the few. If our investment in tomorrow is destroyed by thoughtless action by any faction—inside or outside of Government—the economic fall-out would radiate directly and indirectly into every State in the Union * * * including Alaska.

" 'Only healthy, vigorous, unshackled industry can pay taxes to support the many and vast governmental programs we have today. We are firmly convinced that the Government believes in taxes.

" 'Therefore, we are confident that the Government will protect its investment to the extent of permitting us a realistic return on our investment.' "

"ADDITIONAL REMARKS OF MASTER OF CEREMONIES RICHARD P. SMITH

"Ladies and gentlemen, we come now to a very proud moment for the business press—the presentation of its silver quill awards. You may be sure that there were many outstanding candidates recommended to the selection committee. However, there are no others more deserving of this highest tribute of the business press than those who are about to receive it. I think that it is high time that business began to speak up for its democratic rights in a more unified and more forceful manner. I feel that it is high time that real statesmanship is recognized by business. We are honored by the presence of a real statesman who is to make our silver quill presentations—a man beloved by the party which he leads in the Senate, respected by both Republicans and Democrats and esteemed by all who know him. Senator JOHNSON, the business press is and always will be honored by your presence. We are delighted to have you here to present our silver quill awards to former Speaker MARTIN and to Speaker RAYBURN.

"REMARKS OF SENATE MAJORITY LEADER LYNDON B. JOHNSON IN PRESENTING THE 1958 SILVER QUILL AWARD OF NATIONAL BUSINESS PUBLICATIONS, INC., TO JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

"I would like to say to the members of National Business Publications that you are doubly fortunate in your choice—doubly fortunate because you have been doubly wise.

"JOE MARTIN has labored under some handicaps through the years. He was a Republican and he did not come from Texas.

"But there is one handicap under which JOE MARTIN has never had to labor. He has always had friends who bear in their inmost hearts a deep respect and a deep affection for him.

"I would like to say that I am one of those friends.

"There are many people who describe JOE MARTIN as a plain man. It is a word that is apt in many particulars.

"His integrity is plain for all to see. His devotion to his country is plain for all to see. And his dedication to duty is plain for all to see.

"These are qualities which have been tested in the court of critical opinion. And in every instance, JOE MARTIN has passed 100 percent.

"I learned to know him early when I came to Washington. I discovered in JOE MARTIN depths of sincerity; attributes of direct honesty and warm friendship for all of his colleagues.

"Over the years, there have been many occasions when I disagreed with JOE MARTIN. There have been many times when I thought he was in error. But I never had the faintest suspicion that it was an error of the heart.

"And I have never known a time when JOE MARTIN'S word was anything but good. Nobody needs to draw up a contract with him to insure compliance.

"Whenever an award is presented to any man, those who make the award must always face certain problems. The most important is the standard that is to be used in picking the recipient.

"What are the criteria that apply to JOE MARTIN?

"This is a man who loves his country.

"This is a man who serves his country.

"This is a man who is dedicated to his duty above all other considerations.

"This is a man who is a good and faithful servant of his convictions.

"JOE, this is an occasion which gives me more pleasure than it gives you.

"I am in a position tonight to pay tribute and honor to two close and trusted friends. I am in a position to say some of the things that are in my heart and have been in my heart for many years.

You and SAM RAYBURN will always be associated together in my mind. And you will always have a special place in the hearts of your countrymen.

"It is in that spirit that I present to you the Silver Quill Award.

"REMARKS OF JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., FORMER SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE, IN RECEIVING THE 1958 SILVER QUILL AWARD OF NATIONAL BUSINESS PUBLICATIONS, INC., JANUARY 23, 1959, WASHINGTON, D.C.

"Mr. Chairman, Mr. President, Speaker RAYBURN, Senator JOHNSON, distinguished guests, both of the local government and of abroad, my friends of the National Business Publications, I appreciate the generous reception you have given me. It will stimulate me in the years ahead, in giving more positive service to our common country. Believe me, Senator JOHNSON, I am deeply touched by your very generous words and the high standards you have attributed to me. I hope, Senator JOHNSON, that I may be worthy of these words you have uttered, coming as they do from a great Democratic leader whom we, in the course of our daily life, come into contact with—sometimes rather sharply, but always with a keen appreciation that our opponents are just as patriotic and just as American as we are.

"I am grateful beyond words to be selected to receive this twin Silver Quill Award—along with my old friend—time-honored friend—SAM. It is truly one of the greatest honors of my life and, of course, the fact that the trophy was made in Attleboro does not diminish from its value. SAM and I have shared a basic belief and I think it overshadows the differences between parties. Above all, we believe that we are trying to work out a life in America that will bring happiness and comfort to millions of people. We may have had different ways, sometimes, to approach the subject, but the goal in sight was always the same for either one of us. I believe that two men working with a common purpose can reach a goal. That is why I love America, because that is the way we solve the problems that we have in this great country of ours. We debate, we compromise and we arrive at the solution that means the best for America. Since I have this honor with SAM RAYBURN tonight, I want to say right here and now, he's one of the greatest Americans of this age. It is a rare privilege indeed, SAM, to be with you on this, which I consider a most joyous evening.

"I have enjoyed every one of these brilliant dinners in Washington, since they were initiated 7 years ago. I have witnessed six of the past awards to Paul Wooton, Vice President NIXON, former President Hoover, inventor Kettering, now deceased; my old friends of years, Senator HARRY BYRD, and Ben Fairless. I consider this occasion each year to be unmatched anywhere in our time. I believe that it is of unusual benefit to the country to bring the leaders of our Government and of our industry together on such occasions. It can only develop a mutuality of respect and a greater understanding of each other's problems—and those of our country.

"I have always felt completely at home at this head table, far more than I do tonight. You see, I am an old editor and publisher and still keep a finger in the running of the hometown daily. So, there's no need to explain to you what I mean when I say that it's a very satisfying experience to know the smell of printer's ink.

"I have just a few more things to say tonight. I want to say something about our unrelenting requirements for a constant stream of new information concerning the technology of our modern way of life. I want to say something about the high purpose and integrity of the publishers who are represented by this outstanding organization, by this unduplicated dinner and by this magnificent audience.

"As you know, I've been in Congress for more than 35 years, having twice been Speaker of the House. During all that time, I have never known your people to ask for anything that they didn't honestly and fairly deserve and believe in. I have never heard you threaten to use the influence of your persuasive voice to obtain some purely selfish end. I have never been told of any attempt by your legislative representatives to exert undue pressure on the Members of Congress. How much better would be America if other organizations could say the same. We'd have a much better country.

"Instead, you've always been most unselfish, cooperative and understanding—as trustworthy sources of vital facts and figures. Instead, you've always been and you remain unequaled as channels of communication for the advancement of the trades, the sciences, the professions and the industries of America.

"Without your publications to spread the gospel of specialized knowhow and to bring about the quick exchange of adult education—I am confident that the progress of our economy could be retarded to a point where we might become a second-rate power. I am sure that the Speaker and Senator JOHNSON will agree with me that these are indeed substantial accomplishments and services you have rendered.

"We face today a most important period in our existence as a nation—our freedoms, our form of government, yes, even our very security are at stake. It's a great challenge we face and we must not fail in this decisive moment. The great struggle lies before us and you can rest assured that, in the days ahead, my single objective will be to contribute my experience, according to my conscientious judgment, to the progress and happiness of the country I love and the security of the peoples of the free world.

"I've been privileged by the Great Legislator of all mankind to live a long life. I have been blessed with many lasting memories of good friends and good times. However, I can assure you that this wonderful evening with the business press and this symbol of your friendship will be a most treasured memory which will last forever. And so, Senator JOHNSON, I'm very proud to accept at your hands the Silver Quill, coming as it does from a great organization for good in America. I'm glad, Speaker SAM, to share with you the honor because I know how richly you deserve it and I know it cannot fail but to inspire you, as it does me, to more intensive service for our common good in these days ahead. May God bless you all and keep you steadfast in your important work in helping to make America the great country I think it is going to be in the days ahead.

"REMARKS OF SENATE MAJORITY LEADER LYNDON B. JOHNSON IN PRESENTING THE 1958 SILVER QUILL AWARD OF NATIONAL BUSINESS PUBLICATIONS, INC., TO SAM RAYBURN

"I suppose SAM RAYBURN has listened to more spoken words than any other man now living.

"I also suspect he has heard more words of praise for himself than any other American who has ever lived.

"The first record was established because of the jobs he has held. And the second resulted from the way he has served in those jobs.

"SAM RAYBURN is one of those rare figures who has, during his active years of service, earned and received just recognition as a great American of his time.

"Because I know and love this great man, I am especially proud to have a part in this presentation. It is one of the most appropriate and most fitting ever given him.

"SAM RAYBURN has never proclaimed himself a special pleader for business. Neither has he done so for labor nor anyone else.

"If he has a special interest in his heart, it is the Fourth District of Texas and all of America.

"Yet the whole of SAM RAYBURN'S service has been dedicated to one end: the building of a stronger Nation and the advancement of an expanding free economy.

"SAM RAYBURN has had faith in the capacity of a free system to produce. Basically, I believe such a faith is and will always be the business community's first interest. For it is when the men at the top of our Government begin to falter in that faith that the system itself begins to manifest the symptoms of internal illness.

"SAM RAYBURN has had a high sense of dedication to the concept of responsible capitalism. Look at our economy today. There is at the moment no more vital symbol of confidence than our stock market. Yet it was largely due to SAM RAYBURN'S vision and courage, his mule-headedness, that Congress, a quarter-century ago, laid the foundations for the public confidence which now abounds in our securities system.

"This is one example of many.

"With the passing of the years, many have forgotten that SAM RAYBURN in the 1930's was the legislative architect of the reforms which reinforced the base of our free enterprise system in the field of securities, utilities, communications, transportation, and many more.

"For business today, this concept of responsible capitalism may well be the most important concept with which free enterprise works.

"Business is facing up to the fact that it is not articulate at home. Business must, I am convinced, also face the fact it is not sufficiently articulate abroad.

"We live in a world which does not use the American definition of capital. Abroad, even in our own hemisphere, capital carries a connotation which no longer jibes—if it ever did—with the American meaning.

"Our greatest single challenge over the next quarter century may well be to spell out for other nations the American definition of responsible capitalism.

"Men who believe in the future as SAM RAYBURN does are indispensable to this labor.

"SAM RAYBURN believed in the future of American enterprise in days when many businessmen themselves had lost faith. But for the faith of this man, and the abiding confidence he inspired in others about him, we might have made a ruinous turn and have never come to the abundance we now experience.

"Mr. Speaker, to you I would express, not merely as a friend, but as a student and as an admirer, gratitude which this award symbolizes—and commemorates—for the leadership you have afforded.

"Some have described you as 'Mr. Texas.' Others have called you 'Mr. Democrat.' But I suggest it might be more fitting if you were identified as 'Mr. Confidence.'

"For your confidence has kept our Nation on course in times of test.

"Your confidence has held our Nation above the bogs of partisanship.

"Your confidence has been a keystone in the arch of prosperity over the lives of all the people, in business, in labor, on the farms, the whole of our society.

"It is my honor, my very happy honor, I should say, to present you the Silver Quill Award for 1958.

"REMARKS OF SAM RAYBURN, THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE, IN RECEIVING THE 1958 SILVER QUILL AWARD OF NATIONAL BUSINESS PUBLICATIONS, INC., JANUARY 23, 1959, WASHINGTON, D.C.

"Mr. Chairman, members of this organization, my old fellow worker, JOE MARTIN, and my partial friend, LYNDON JOHNSON, I thank you all. To be a recipient of this token of your respect means a great deal to me, as it does to my friend JOE. JOE and I have been in the House of Representatives for a long time. I a little longer than he. We have sat on different sides of the aisle. We have belonged to different parties and we have changed positions in the House of Representatives several times. He has taken the gavel away from me twice and I want to say that that gavel was never in more honest or more capable hands in all the history of the speakership then when it was in the hands of JOE MARTIN.

"I have had many honors. People have given me everything that I have asked them to give. I have now served continuously in the House of Representatives longer than any other man in the history of the House of Representatives. I have served as Speaker of the House of Representatives 6 years longer than any other man in the history of the House of Representatives ever served. Somebody was talking to me a while ago and said, 'You can talk freely because we're not going to quote you.' 'Well,' I said, 'go ahead and quote everything that you want to quote, because I am one man in American politics who can't be hurt. I've already had mine and nobody can take that away.'

"JOE MARTIN and I have been disciples of the doctrine that legislation should never be passed to punish anybody, any group or any sector or any section of our country. But, that legislation should be passed to bring about justice, fairplay and equal opportunity among all of our people. I can remember when people, who didn't understand, said—as LYNDON referred to in the early thirties—that when I was handling a bill to control issues of securities that I was going to stop the circulation of any kind of securities in interstate commerce. I had no such idea. I wanted clean securities and I think today—and not many months or years after that bill passed the House of Representatives—that the good, honest issuers of securities in this country are proud that the desperados and the cheats have been driven out of their midst.

"Then, along came the Stock Exchange Regulation Act. The unthinking and the unknowing said that that bill was going to close the stock exchanges. My answer to that was that I was further from wanting to close the stock exchanges than they were. Of course, they do business and do things that no other organization can do. We have passed a clean Securities Act and now we want a clean place in which to buy, sell, and exchange securities. It might be news to you for me to say, that, for many years after that bill passed, every president of the New York Stock Exchange, after he was elected, came to my office and said to me that they wouldn't be governor of the New York Stock Exchange if it were not for that bill. 'Because,' they said, 'we, as some others who have been on the exchange, might get into bad trouble.'

"So, when people say that we are unknowing, that we do not understand that the problems of business are the problems of our country, just remember that 435, now 436, honest men and women—selected men and women—chosen after contest, are down here in Washington trying to do and are doing their best for you and for all of the other American people. We're not perfect. We make mistakes, as everybody does, but we are as willing and as ready to acknowledge those mistakes and try to cure them as anybody else.

"The committees of Congress hunger and thirst for men of your type and character who understand business, who understand the trends, who have a patriotic desire to make things better, not only for business but for all the people of the country. They welcome you before those committees and they thirst for the information that you have, as it is helpful to them in arriving at a just and a fair conclusion before they report a bill and have it placed on the calendar of the Senate or the House of Representatives.

"I saw a letter today that someone published and sent out to business people—I won't mention the name of the sheet because I wouldn't want to advertise it, since somebody might be peculiar and want to buy it—it said I was a dangerous radical, that I was a collectivist and a few other adjectives like that—I would hate to repeat, in LYNDON's presence, what it said about him. But, the person who wrote it was writing something that he thought somebody would buy and somebody would believe. So, come down and visit with us—and come to know us.

"Usually, the average man says, 'Oh, my Congressman's all right but that other 435. If all were like my Congresman.' Well, the people in the district of the other fellow think just as much of their Congressman as you do of yours and, sometimes, when they get so they don't like theirs, they make a little change.

"Now, I'm not going to say anything about politics this evening but I will say this, since the election on November 4, I've heard more about balance then I'd ever heard in the same length of time before. We've had some of that here this evening and I hope we'll balance so that everybody will have a fair chance. Let me say again—without wearying you, because I realize, as you do, that it is getting to the shank of the evening and you may be a little tired—how deeply appreciative I am of this honor that you have conferred upon me. It will be one of my prize possessions that will go in my library at my home town of Bonham, Tex.

"I want to say to you again, as JOE MARTIN suggested, that in this dangerous world in which we live—and I think it is the most dangerous world, frought with more things to disturb people than any other time since Christian civilization began—we in the Congress are going to sift recommendations for money and for legislation. We are going to try to do the things that will put our country in a posture of defense both militarily and economically, because we cannot be in a posture of military defense and not be in a great posture of economic defense. We're going to appropriate the money that we think necessary to make our country so strong, in both directions, that no international desperado will ever dare to try to set foot upon the sacred soil of the United States of America.

"And so, in closing, let me again say what a great honor it is to be with you this evening and to receive this tribute in connection with one of the same sort given to an old friend. I wish that each of you, throughout the years which are allotted to you, may enjoy to the fullest extent the rich blessings of health, a reasonable degree of prosperity, and one day, under God, that this Nation and all good peoples throughout the world may look toward a peace that will be enduring."

FARGO CITY COMMISSIONERS SEEK BENSON RESIGNATION

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the dissatisfaction with the farm policies of this administration, which has existed in rural areas for some time, now appears to be in evidence in the cities also. So great has been the concern that we find an American city for the first time calling for the resignation of Secretary Ezra Taft Benson.

I have just received a communication from Herschel Lashkowitz, mayor of the city of Fargo, N. Dak., advising me that a pronouncement, which was signed by every member of the Fargo City Commission, was read at the commission meeting held February 3, 1959, and I was further advised that, pursuant to the understanding of the city commission, I be requested to insert the pronouncement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The pronouncement reads as follows:

Throughout this general area people are keenly interested in the growth, progress and economic development of the city of Fargo and its inhabitants. Correspondingly, the people of Fargo are also keenly interested in economic conditions and the well-being of its friends and neighbors in surrounding rural areas.

It is universally recognized these days that our economy is an interdependent economy, and that which adversely affects agriculture sooner or later has an adverse effect on business, labor and the general public. It has now been clearly established that one vital segment of the economy such as agriculture cannot suffer without there being cumulative effects on the rest of the people. Therefore, the interdependence of agriculture, industry, business and labor must be recognized.

Fargo is the center of a great farm belt and our people depend upon agriculture for their sustenance and livelihood. Therefore Fargo, like any agricultural community, cannot afford to stand back and permit the deterioration of our agricultural economy, and the continuing decline of farm income, accompanied by the general accelerated move away from the farm.

The news reported by the Associated Press as late as last Saturday, January 31, was headlined "Farm Income To Decrease by Many Millions—Benson Shakes Up Price Supports in Agriculture," and heralds the downward spiral of farm income and its ultimate effect on this area and our people.

Therefore, recognizing that the peril of agriculture is the peril of all citizens in this area whether they live in villages, towns, or cities, or on the farm, we call for the immediate resignation of Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson, whose policies have contributed to this unfortunate decline in our agricultural economy and farm income. We regret that Secretary Benson, by his policies, appears to regard farmers and farms as just so many increments or statistics on a chart, and Secretary Benson also appears by his policies to lack feeling or concern for the plight of the individual farmer.

The Benson policy, as announced and administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, can only mean eventual ruination to many of our family farms and imposes a cumulative unfortunate effect on the rest of our economy.

In the event Mr. Benson does not submit his resignation, we respectfully call on the President of the United States to ask for Mr. Benson's resignation and to replace the Secretary of Agriculture with a new face and a new policy, based upon determined bipartisan attempts to help restore farm income and save the family-sized farm.

FARGO CITY COMMISSION.
Meeting of February 3, 1959.

Mr. Speaker, the farm policies of Secretary Benson, which have caused surpluses to mount, prices to decline, and administration costs to rise, and which were again ratified in the President's farm message, must be brought to an end. It should be the duty of this Congress to enact legislation which will bring about parity of income to the farmer, and increase purchasing power on the mainstreets of our cities and towns. This should be our duty despite the possibility of a Presidential veto.

GOOD OPPORTUNITIES FOR FUTURE FARMERS OF AMERICA

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, each year during the week of George Washington's birthday the Nation pays tribute to the Future Farmers of America. This year the period of February 22d through the 28th has been designated as "National Future Farmers of America Week." It is quite fitting that the anniversary of George Washington's birth should be the occasion for focusing attention on this national farm organization, for Washington is a sort of patron saint of the Future Farmers of America. Our first President was also this country's first scientific farmer and on his farm called Mount Vernon he experimented with new crops, new tools, new methods of cultivation and fertilization. He advocated and practiced the rotation of crops to conserve the soil, long before that practice became general. Washington could not benefit from the wealth of information available to farmers today through agricultural colleges, experiment stations and other agencies of the Government. He had to rely on "Doing to learn," a phrase in the FFA Motto, and an integral part of the program of the Future Farmers of America. Washington conducted endless experiments, carefully recording all the information he obtained, designed and built some of his tools, and even tried various systems of marketing to find the one that would give the best return for his crops. The FFA honors Washington not only for his practical contributions to the advancement of agriculture and his early recognition of the need for soil conservation, but also for his love of country life.

The national FFA organization was launched at Kansas City, Mo., in 1928 and on August 30, 1950, a Federal charter was granted to the Future Farmers of America through passage of Public Law 740, during the 81st Congress of the United States. Had I been a Member of Congress at that time, the vote of the second congressional district would most certainly have been cast for passage of this law. I know of no national student organization more deserving of praise than the Future Farmers of America for by their very existence we are assured that the farmer of tomorrow will be prepared to meet the increasing demands both at home and abroad for agricultural products.

In this age of mechanization and the application of science to all phases of production agriculture has not been neglected. Research is constantly being conducted to improve the quality of our crops and on today's mechanized farm the latest methods of soil conservation, scientific breeding, crop rotation, and contour planting are utilized to get the maximum production per acre. Vocational education in agriculture—a nationwide program of systematic instruction in agriculture and farm mechanics conducted in public high schools all over the country—is providing the technical knowledge and practical know-how required of the success farmer of tomorrow. Enrollment in vocational agriculture is a prerequisite to membership in the Future Farmers of America. It is through application of their vocational training the FFA members are able to carry out the programs and projects of their organization. Vocational agriculture and the FFA constitute the most effective program yet developed for training boys to be good farmers and helping them to become established in the farming occupations of their choice.

In the Second Congressional District of Kentucky we have many chapters of the Future Farmers of America and we have only to look at the achievements of the members of this organization to realize the influence for good they are exerting on their rural communities. This influence is continued to be felt as many members of the FFA pass on into the ranks of the Farm Bureau, Farmers Union, and other agricultural and civic groups, there to accept and to fill creditably places of trust and responsibility while still in their youth.

I am in wholehearted agreement with the FFA creed which begins with the declaration "I believe in the future of farming," and I also believe that there are good opportunities for good farmers. There has been much discussion in recent years of the farm problem with low prices resulting from surplus production; however, the longtime outlook is good. because our population is increasing so rapidly that more and more farm products are needed every year. The Future Farmers of America will be depended upon, by an ever-expanding population, for the supplies of nutritious foods and other agricultural products that will keep our people healthy. It is comforting to know that the future of American agriculture will be in the hands of well-trained, civic-minded citizens who are dedicated to the principle that abundant agricultural production is the backbone of America's strength.

Mr. Speaker, an outstanding example of a good farmer who is preparing himself to accept the agricultural opportunities of the future is Danny Duvall, 18, of Rural Route 7, Bowling Green, Ky. At the 21st farm awards luncheon held in Louisville, Ky., on Saturday, February 14, 1959, this young gentleman from my home town in Warren County was chosen top Future Farmer of America in Kentucky. Danny Duvall has a 50–50 partnership with his father, Marvin, on their 120-acre farm. Presently a senior at Bristow High School in Bowling Green, he will farm full time upon graduation. Danny is a member of the Junior Conservation Club, Farm Bureau, and Jersey Cattle Club, and has also participated in several FFA public-speaking contests. Ranny Duvall's selection for this top FFA award demonstrates the truly commendable work being done by this fine organization in my section of Kentucky.

GOOD NEIGHBOR POLICY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, recent and past events regretfully bring to light the fact that our good neighbor policy toward our Latin American friends demands immediate attention if the Western Hemisphere is to achieve a maximum degree of strength in time of emergency and a maximum degree of prosperity in time of peace. We have too long taken for granted our friendship with our neighbors to the South. Our attitude of complacency has sowed the seeds of misunderstanding to the detriment of our best interests as well as theirs.

It is with a distinct pride that I point to the efforts of Florida's able and outstanding Senator GEORGE SMATHERS, and the contributions he has made toward promoting good relations between the United States and Latin America. Over the years he has repeatedly warned of the events that would take place and which did take place with the pursuit of a "de-emphasis" policy. His vision, foresight and brilliant analysis has earned for him the highest respect both in and out of the Congress, in the field of United States-Latin American relations. He has made inestimable contributions to his country's well-being. Floridians have a particular pride in all his many accomplishments—accomplishments for which the Nation itself will be forever indebted, and which have marked him as a national leader.

By virtue of the leadership of this distinguished son of Florida, progress is being made in effectively doing something about the deterioration that has taken place in our relations with our South American friends who have contributed so much to the well-being and defense of this great country of ours.

On January 31, Senator GEORGE SMATHERS delivered a brilliant and enlightening speech demonstrating his remarkable leadership in Latin American affairs at a dinner honoring President Frondizi, of Argentina, at Miami Beach, Fla. The contents of Senator SMATHERS' remarks, calling for a revision in our policy dealing with military assistance to Latin American countries in order that greater concentration can be given to promoting a stable economy in the area, should be considered by every Member of Congress.

Let me review for you that important speech:

Senor Presidente, General Frondizi; Your Excellencies; my favorite Congressman, DANTE FASCELL; county commissioners and public officials; friends of Argentina all—y mis amigos.

A pesar de que estudie castellano por tres anos en la Universidad de Florida, espera que usted perdone mi inabilidad para hablarlo. Yo no se si mi profesor no era muy bueno, o si yo soy muy esturido, pero he llegado a la conclusion de que la culpa no fue de mi profesor.

La semana pasada estuve presente en la sesion solemne del Congreso donde eschuche su discurso. Queremos que usted sepa que su vista significa mucho en el curso de las relaciones de nuestros paises.

Admiramos su lucha contra la tirania y su esfuerzo para rehabilitar las instituciones democraticas.

Espera que nuestra compania le haga sentirse como si estuviera en su casa.

Con su permiso, Senor Presidente, continuare hablando en Ingles para que me entiendan las personas que no habian castellano. Creo que usted tambien me entendera mejor por medio de su interprete.

For those of you who speak only English, let me explain that I've just been saying a few words of welcome to our distinguished guest in Spanish—my Spanish.

As for those of you who do speak Spanish, surely after my rendition, you must recall the story about Mark Twain, who spent a number of years as a Mississippi River boat pilot. He had a riverman's flair for picturesque speech, including an astonishing vocabulary of swear words, which he delighted in exercising.

It is said that Mrs. Twain tried for many years to break him of the habit. She coaxed, she begged, she cajoled—all without success.

Finally, she decided she'd try showing him how terrible it sounded. She made a list of the curses Mark Twain used, until she had about 5 minutes' worth, and one day, in the midst of a family conversation, she pulled it out and in what she conceived to be the proper manner, read it off.

Mark Twain heard her through to the end. Then he smiled and said: "My dear, you've got all the right words—but you haven't got the tune."

So it is with me and my Spanish. I speak it like a rock'n roll band playing Mozart. I trust, however, that my efforts this evening haven't permanently damaged United States-Latin American relations. But I'm trying and I'm sure the Presidente knows the purity of my intentions, even if not the purity of my Castilian.

I

I know you all join me in extending the most enthusiastic of greetings to this courageous leader who directs the destiny of a great sister republic at a critical moment in its history.

As many of you know, during my 12 years in the Congress I have talked long and feelingly on the need to improve relationships between Latin America and the United States. I've made some headway, but it's been only a pigmy step.

However, in a few minutes before the Congress, in a speech which, next to Sir Winston Churchill's, was the most eloquent, moving, and logical that I've heard in 12 years—President Frondizi made the case for Latin America. He quickly bridged the gap. He suddenly opened the eyes of all to the true meaning and urgency of good Latin-American relationships. Mr. President, your speech was a verbal ICBM—a missile of goodness, of democracy, of friendship, of ideals and ideas. In a few seconds, you spanned the gap between Argentina and the United States. I commend you for a superlative performance.

II

Today we all know that a powerful surge of democratic spirit is sweeping through the Americas.

The revolution that toppled Peron and elevated Senor Frondizi was the first in a series of popular uprisings which have thinned the ranks of the dictators, almost to the vanishing point. We here hope democracy will now prevail, for we know it to be the only system which allows the full expression of man's dignity, and capacity, and worth.

We in the United States have been justifiably and wisely chary—ever since we discarded gunboat diplomacy—of appearing to force others to do things our way. We do not insist that the governments of the Americas be modeled in our image.

Quite naturally, differences in experience and temperament are going to result in a variety of political systems. The choice is not ours to make—nor should it be.

But we are hopeful that democracy will prove to be contagious. We believe in democracy, we define it as did the historian Merle Curti, "as the doctrine that all men possess, a sacred, irrevocable right to govern themselves and to reach for the stars."

But, as President Frondizi so eloquently and incisively reminded us in his address to the Congress, victory over dictatorship is not automatically followed by the words: "And they lived happily ever after."

In Argentina, dictatorship left behind a terrible political and economic wreckage as it did in the other republics which have thrown off the yoke.

The present government is still plowing through the initial posttyranny stage, clearing away the debris of ruined lives, repairing and reconstructing the shattered foundations of democracy, reshaping the twisted superstructure of the economy.

President Frondizi told us his biggest challenge still lies ahead.

So this is the first lesson: That freedom and democracy will endure in Latin America only as they prove to be the right weapons for overpowering the misery and poverty which still disfigure too much of Latin America.

We should know by now that hemispheric prosperity cannot be plucked from a tree like an orange. It has to be build arduously brick by brick. But we also know that this awesome task is best begun by people who share generally the same ideals, the same goals. That was the history of our own colonies, and that was the history of our own States.

Today the United States and Argentina, under Frondizi, stand on common soil, sharing the same ideals, the same hopes and aspirations. We are finally on the same side—and we must help our teammate as we would expect to be helped.

We in the United States know that defense of our own freedom depends heavily on the strength of the other Americas, on their ability to withstand, over the long haul, both the lure and menace of communism.

I sometimes feel that for the past 12 years I've been as tiresome on this point as an overexposed television series. Unfortunately, my message is ever a new one, because too few seem to listen, or to care. Most of you have heard me urge our Government to develop an active and systematic cooperation with our sister republics, individually and collectively. You have heard me plead for funds to wipe off this hemisphere the diseases which cancel the energies of our peoples. You have heard me press for a more liberal Export-Import Bank policy; for greater sympathy toward Latin American petitions to the Development Loan Fund; for the creation of a separate inter-American bank; for more technical assistance; for a truly dramatic student exchange program, the one single program that can raise the level of intelligence and improve understanding like no other.

These pleas have reverberated off the walls of the Senate, and the ears of the State Department, with disconcerting ineffectiveness. Still, I would not say the efforts have been wasted or completely unavailing.

Recently our government has awakened from its preoccupation with Europe and Asia to recognize the validity of the Inter-American Bank proposal. We all are now for it. In addition, under some pressure, they have stepped up technical aid and recently made some sensible loans, one of them to Argentina.

Meanwhile, there is one aspect of United States policy which seems to me to require a thorough airing. That is the question of military aid and military missions to the American republics.

The news earlier this month that we planned to send 54 Marines to Haiti has caused a great deal of worried comment, both in Congress and out.

Without a fuller explanation than has thus far been forthcoming from either the State or Defense Departments, it is difficult for me to see what military interest of the United States this mission is intended to serve.

It would appear very much as if we are deliberately walking into the middle of the explosive Caribbean situation with our eyes shut to the consequences, like a man in a top hat parading past a boy with a snowball.

I am not going to belabor this point tonight. But it's clear that the only fact that is apparent at this moment is that our military missions to Latin America have created a great deal of misunderstandings and ill feeling on a number of counts, nor have their advantages yet been demonstrated.

No one, for example, can get around the fact that American military supplies have been used in at least one instance, and perhaps more than once, to support unpopular regimes in power.

The military mission and aid to Cuba during the Batista regime is today a very sore point in Cuba. Some Cubans claim that Batista turned those weapons sent by the United States on the revolutionaries. On the other hand, the pro-Batista people were unhappy because they claimed our Government stopped the supply of weapons at the critical moment. What the facts are, I don't pretend to know—except that we are abused by both sides, and the purposes of the military mission are grossly misunderstood.

Similar charges were heard in Colombia after the overthrow of Rojas Pinilla. In this case, the evidence was rather clear. I have myself seen pictures of United States cannons and United States shells in action against the people leading the revolution.

It seems to me axiomatic that we cannot claim to support democracy if our weapons are used to enslave people.

Of course, I'm familiar with the argument that these weapons and military missions are intended solely to increase the effectiveness of hemisphere defense.

I doubt the validity of the assertion.

So far as I can see, it rests on the theory that world war III, if it comes, God forbid, will be fought with the same weapons and on the same strategic plan as was World War II.

How else to explain the decision last year to turn over 11 outmoded destroyers to various Latin American governments?

I have been advised by competent military men that these destroyers would be utterly worthless for tracking down and destroying modern submarines with their atomic power and payloads.

As Khrushchev and Mikoyan has so often said, the real battlefield of the future will be social and economic—and if a shooting war cannot be avoided, it will be fought, not with battleships and carriers and long campaigns through South and Central America, but with hydrogen warheads and missiles delivered across the roof of the world to primary targets in the United States.

To arm and train the hemisphere countries in the changing techniques of nuclear war is beyond our capacity, what with our staggering commitments on the very periphery of the Soviet Union.

Let's not fool ourselves. The outmoded military aid which we make available to Latin America and force on our neighbors in some instances, does not relieve the United States in any appreciable fashion of its present responsibilities for hemisphere defense.

This program does—indeed it already has created a special set of problems all its own.

In addition to those mentioned, it oftimes upsets the balance of power among the individual republics. The 11-destroyer deal which our military sought to push through Congress last year, and which I blocked, would have given a destroyer to Peru, but not to Ecuador—thereby causing Ecuadorians to grow excited and conclude we had taken Peru's side in the long struggle between those two fine countries.

Aside from the matter of national pride, which is not unimportant, arms for one nation and not others in equal amounts creates uncertainty and fear. It seems that the United States is taking a hand in affairs which are really none of its concern.

Moreover, arming Latin America with outmoded weapons is a clear invitation to disaster. It is building a shell around a vacuum and diverting needed energies from more vital tasks. When we send them equipment, we put a heavy burden for maintenance on already overburdened treasuries. In several countries, the resulting strain could be the difference between success and failure of the democratic experiment.

In addition to the financial aspects, there is the waste of human resources which results from diversion of some of the hemisphere's finest minds into essentially unproductive work—and to what purpose?

To furnish the illusion of defense—an illusion, let me add, that is as dangerous to our own state of mind as it is to the political and economic stability of our sister republics.

Several countries are already beginning to reach this verdict on their own. Mexico informed us, a while back, that it wants none of our military missions or our weapons. Should we wait until the other countries reach the same conclusion?

It seems to me that we ought to restudy and reconsider now. In the long run, the future of Latin America depends, not on the "availability" of World War II weapons to fight a war which will never be fought.

No; Latin America's future rests with schooling its citizens in the democratic process and with a frontal assault on poverty, illiteracy and misery.

Should we in the United States not ask ourselves would we not be making a sounder contribution to the strength of the things in which we believe, if we called off our missions of marines and substituted missions of agronomists and public health specialists, of engineers and educators?

President Frondizi seems to me to personify the new direction that we should take in Latin America.

As the first Argentine President to visit the United States while in office, he has set the tone for a new era, the end of a long period of estrangement, and the start, I hope, of a new and brilliant period of cooperation.

Our two countries lie almost at the extremes of the Western Hemisphere. If the United States and Argentina can come together and replace former differences and misunderstanding with understanding, then indeed there is real hope for revival of a meaningful Good Neighbor policy.

Again, Senor Presidente, welcome. We are gratified and proud of your presence and wish for you and the Argentine people a fulfillment of their dreams. May this meeting symbolize the linkage of North and South America and the sincerity of our desire for a richer and fuller life for all.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, February 17, 1959, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

557. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of State, relative to International Labor Conference Convention No. 105, pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labor Organization (H. Doc. No. 78); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

558. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, relative to the cooperative program of the United States with Mexico for the control and the eradication of foot-and-mouth disease for the period July 1, 1958, to December 31, 1958, pursuant to Public Law 8, 80th Congress; to the Committee on Agriculture.

559. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting the report of the General Sales Manager on Commodity Credit Corporation sales policies, activities, and dispositions for the month of December 1958; to the Committee on Appropriations.

560. A letter from the Secretary of the Army, transmitting a report on the progress of the Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps flight training program covering the period August 1, 1956, to December 1, 1958, pursuant to Public Law 879, 84th Congress; to the Committee on Armed Services.

561. A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting additional information relating to a letter dated July 29, 1958, concerning the proposed disposition of approximately 13,860,000 ounces of quinine now held in the national stockpile; to the Committee on Armed Services.

562. A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to make the Policemen and Firemen's Retirement and Disability Act Amendments of 1957 applicable to widows and children of former members of the Metropolitan Police force, the Fire Department of the District of Columbia, the U.S. Park Police force, the White House Police force, and the U.S. Secret Service Division, who were retired or whose death occurred prior to the effective date of such amendments of 1957"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

563. A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to facilitate the acquisition of real property under the District of Columbia Alley Dwelling Act"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

564. A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the act regulating the bringing of actions for damages against the District of Columbia, approved February 28, 1933"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

565. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the Sugar Act program, Commodity Stabilization Service, Department of Agriculture, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1957; to the Committee on Government Operations.

566. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the review of the fiscal year 1957 entitlements to Federal payments to meet a share of local school district current expenditures for those school districts located in federally affected areas, pursuant to Public Law 874, 81st Congress, as amended; to the Committee on Government Operations.

567. A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting the report of the Archivist of the United States on records proposed for disposal under the law; to the Committee on House Administration.

568. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, transmitting a copy of the report on backlog of pending applications and hearing cases in the Federal Communications Commission as of December 31, 1958, pursuant to Public Law 554, 82d Congress; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

569. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the act of March 11, 1948 (62 Stat. 78), relating to the establishment of the DeSoto National Memorial, in the State of Florida"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

570. A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, relative to a draft of a bill which would amend section 251 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended; to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

571. A letter from the clerk, U.S. Court of Claims, relative to the case of Georgia Kaolin Company v. The United States (No. Congressional 7–55), pursuant to sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28, United States Code, and to House Resolution 250, 84th Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

572. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a report relative to war-risk insurance and certain marine and liability insurance for the American public as of December 31, 1958, pursuant to the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

573. A letter from the Deputy Secretary of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to provide, in the event of an emergency evacuation, certain authority relating to the pay of civilian officers and employees on duty outside the United States or at other places designated by the President"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

574. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to authorize Federal assistance to Guam, American Samoa, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands in major disasters"; to the Committee on Public Works.

575. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, relative to the case of Olga Mirko Bjeletic relating to the order for denial, pursuant to the act of September 11, 1957; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, pursuant to the order of the House of February 9, 1959, the following bill was reported on February 13, 1959:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Address by Hon. Alan Bible, of Nevada, Before the Almas Temple Shrine Club, Washington, D.C.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN SPARKMAN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, recently the distinguished senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] made a very interesting speech before the Almas Temple Shrine Club in Washington, D.C. I ask unanimous consent that the speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ALAN BIBLE, ALMAS TEMPLE SHRINE CLUB, WASHINGTON, D.C., FEBRUARY 13, 1959

Fellow nobles, I deem it a real pleasure and a distinct honor to be afforded the opportunity of speaking to the Almas Temple Shrine Luncheon Club today—and, before going any further, I bring you the warmest expressions of good will from Kerak Temple in Reno, Nev.

In a world that seems bent on devising means to bring about its own destruction, it is refreshing to participate today among men of good will, who espouse the high principles of peace and understanding.

Only this week I had the pleasure of reading the definition of a Mason and a Shriner—from no less an authority than George E. Stringfellow, imperial potentate of the Shrine of North America.

A Mason, he said, is a man who believes in God and practices that belief. A Mason is a man who believes in brotherly love and practices his belief. A Mason is a man who uses the symbols of the builder to set for himself and his brethren a code of life which refines his thoughts, purifies his sympathy, and broadens his outlook, it amplifies his friendship, exalts his morality, and tames his passions.

Mr. Stringfellow described a Shriner as a Mason who realizes the work of his craft—exemplifying the high code of morality—requires refreshment. In obtaining that refreshment, Shriners adopted the code, 59 years ago, of pleasure without intemperance, hospitality without rudeness, and jollity without coarseness.

We live today in a world of tensions. The ever-quickening tempo of our times would seem to exclude anything but the mad rush for material gains, yet I have detected in frequent trips through our land a spiritual reawakening and a rebirth of tolerance that give ample evidence of a brighter future. Surely the great work of the Shrine in behalf of crippled children—regardless of race, color, or creed—epitomizes to the fullest extent the fact that charity is not a forgotten virtue.

As Americans we must summon all of our collective strength to meet the challenges posed by Soviet Russia and its ill-disguised efforts to gain world domination. But in this life-and-death race for survival, we must not for one instant lose sight of our dependence upon divine providence for spiritual guidance and the constant realization that "man does not live by bread alone."

Unquestionably, these are times that demand the utmost cooperation and effort of all citizens toward making our country stronger in a material sense. Equally important, in my opinion, is the need for even greater effort to utilize more fully our vast resources of the spirit. Only by so doing can we demonstrably prove to all the world that strength really does come from unity.

Although most of you here today are familiar with the event, I am sure you will not mind if I recall the valiant epic of the four chaplains who, with arms linked, perished with their ship in the North Atlantic in World War II, after giving their own life preservers to others.

I read this magnificent story in a book called "Sea of Glory," by Francis Beauchesne Thornton. The four chaplains were George Lansing Fox and Clark V. Poling, Protestant ministers; Father John P. Washington, a Catholic priest, and Alexander D. Goode, a Jewish rabbi.

The chaplains and their unit were en route to Greenland early in 1943—in the terrible days of German submarine supremacy, when the U-boats unmercifully menaced our shipping lanes and made that particular run a thing of danger and terror.

Their ship was a lumbering old freighter, capable of 10 knots at best. Precisely at 1 a.m. of a February morning, the cold Atlantic silence was broken by a shattering explosion as a German torpedo found its mark amidships. As Mr. Thornton described it: "Everywhere about the ship, in the terror-ridden interior and on the crazily tilted deck, the four chaplains moved among the men with helpful words, giving some the strength to live and some the courage to die."

When pandemonium was at its height, when it became apparent that the ship would soon sink, those chaplains gave their life preservers to other men and made the heroic decision to stay with the ship. As the author states: "Catholic, Jew, and Protestant each proved that night that courage knows no distinction of creed, bravery no division of caste."

Here we see exemplified the highest type of courage and self-sacrifice. There are other kinds of courage, too, and I refer particularly to the courage to live. While we feel that the present age confronts us with problems of almost staggering proportions, we should remember that every generation in our history has had problems—and we have always had men of courage who would rise to the challenge.

Yesterday we observed the 150th anniversary of the birth of such a man. If any person had cause on many occasions to despair and throw in the sponge, it was Abraham Lincoln. His political career was a succession of setbacks. He was defeated for the legislature, he was defeated twice for Congress and twice for the Senate, and he was defeated for nomination as Vice President in 1856. His election to the Presidency in 1860 thrust upon him a burden that was almost insupportable, yet his faith propelled him through the darkest hour in our country's history. Lincoln firmly believed that God had entrusted him with a mission, and in this knowledge he gained the strength that sustained both him and the Nation for which he labored. Lincoln had his watchword. It was stated simply, "With God's help, I shall not fail."

This is a creed all of us could well adopt today, not as a mere utterance but as something to put into practice in our daily lives. As Masons we should strive all the more to translate our precepts into our everyday living—to fight bigotry and intolerance wherever we find it, to inculcate into our youth the importance of fair play, to broaden our horizons beyond our own little circumscribed areas; in short, to give proof that we are alert to our responsibilities as citizens of the greatest country on earth.

In this respect, the great poet, Edwin Markham, wrote:

"We are all blind, until we see
That in the human plan
Nothing is worth the making if
It does not make the man.
Why build these cities glorious
If man unbuilded goes:
In vain we build the work, unless
The builder also grows."

If we are to move forward and maintain our place as leaders of the free world, if we are to leave a legacy of strength and determination for our children—indeed, if we are to survive at all in an age of potential destruction—we must shoulder today's burdens and responsibilities—willingly, resolutely, and courageously.

Fortunately, the great majority of Americans are turning more toward the truths of religion which spell out a code of conduct that can only lead to a stronger country and happier citizens. A look at Russia makes the contrast all the more startling. There we have the sordid spectacle of an ideology which demands that personal honor and integrity be subjugated to the state—not only in the field of government, but in art, literature, science, medicine, and all lines of endeavor.

We in America are bountifully blessed with the resources needed to keep our defenses strong. To complement this pool of resources, I believe we should all draw more upon that even greater reservoir of the spirit that has abounded in our country since its founding more than 180 years ago.

As Masons committed unequivocally to upholding freedom and justice, not only in America but throughout the world wherever tyranny rears its head, we should be leading the way in man's constant battle for human betterment. We should be more than lodge members. We should be articulate spokesmen in a world that sorely needs a voice of hope—and courage—and truth. To fulfill the obligations of our order we can do no less—to fulfill our responsibilities as Americans we must do more.

Huntington, W. Va., Is Lauded by Senator Randolph as All America City

OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, each year 11 U.S. cities are selected by a jury of distinguished citizens and experts on government impaneled by the National Municipal League to receive awards presented under the joint sponsorship of the league and Look magazine for outstanding action in bringing about civic improvements.

West Virginians were happy when one of their cities—Huntington, the county seat of Cabell County, situated on the Ohio River—was honored with a place on the 1958 All America City team.

It seems timely to mention that Clarksburg, W. Va., was so recognized in a previous year.

Presentation of the award was made at appropriate ceremonies in the city of Huntington the evening of February 10, 1959. It was my privilege to have accepted an invitation to participate in the program. Weather conditions prevented me from making the air trip from Washington. I had prepared comments for the event, copies of which were made available to the chairman of the award committee and presented to officials of the city of Huntington.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, extracts from my salute to the officials and citizens of Huntington on the occasion of the celebration of the All America City Award which was so justly deserved.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM STATEMENT ISSUED BY U.S. SENATOR JENNINGS RANDOLPH ON THE OCCASION OF THE HUNTINGTON, W. VA., ALL-AMERICA CITY AWARD CELEBRATION, FEBRUARY 10, 1959

The fine people of Huntington—officials and voters together—have given dramatic evidence of the continued vitality of democracy. Too frequently today we Americans, as private citizens, are inclined to respond to the problems that face us with complaints rather than constructive efforts. Too often the complaint is followed by the purely rhetorical question: "But what can the mere individual do?"

Yes, the people of Huntington have answered that question in unmistakable terms. They have shown with eloquent testimony the resources of the individual citizen when he or she joins others in a voluntary and cooperative venture. And, in so doing, they have translated the ideals of modern democracy into the realities of Huntington today.

Democracy means more than merely a way of electing one's representatives. It means more than the traditional 18th century regard for individual liberties.

Modern democracy means, first of all, the participation of the individual in public affairs. And, secondly, it means that public affairs encompass more than matters of Government policy alone. In a modern society the quality of democracy must permeate all of our cultural institutions; it cannot be restricted to elections and the matter of the ballot alone. This ideal condition of democracy the fine and faithful folk of Huntington have achieved in fact as well as in principle.

In Huntington's new schools, swimming pools, art gallery, and hospitals, as well as the new form of city government—in all of these, and more—it is clear that its people have, through citizen effort, defined the meaning of a democratic culture in the 20th century.

May the rest of West Virginia and the Nation read the lesson of the past 10 dynamic years in Huntington.

John Foster Dulles

OF
HON. PAUL B. DAGUE
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, as one of the consistent admirers and constant supporters of our distinguished Secretary of State I can only contemplate with the deepest concern the prospects of his being immobilized at the moment in history when we need his strong hand at the diplomatic helm more than ever before.

The irony of the situation centers in the fact that many of his most violent critics are now wringing their hands as they desperately scan the horizon for some one to take his place. All of which points up the fact that most of his traducers took their positions for political reasons and show by their concern that they have never had a constructive alternative to Secretary Dulles' firm resistence to international communism.

In my book the only real test of a nation's foreign policy is the avoidance of war, and under John Foster Dulles' guiding hand we have weathered six crises—count them: Straits of Formosa, Suez, Syria-Turkey controversy, Southeast Asia, Lebanon, Quemoy—without firing a shot. And his policy of being able to take the Nation to the brink of war without plunging in has exhibited an adroitness which none of his more recent predecessors ever seemed to possess.

The alarm with which the Secretary's illness has been recorded abroad attests to the respect in which he is held by our allies and the satisfaction with which the Communists must be presumed to welcome his withdrawal from the active conducting of our affairs of state points up as nothing else can the vital necessity of securing in his successor, if and when a selection must be made, a man who will carry on his policies to the minutest detail.

In addition to being a great statesman and a great patriot, John Foster Dulles is a great churchman and we can only prayerfully petition the Almighty God upon Whom he has ever leaned that He will have His servant in His care and that in His good time this great and dedicated American will be restored to full health and strength and the resumption of his ceaseless efforts in the cause of peace.

Russian Actions Compared to Mikoyan Treatment

OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial which was published in the Nashua Telegraph, one of New Hampshire's leading newspapers, on Thursday, February 10, 1959.

Editor Fred H. Dobens, editor of the Nashua Telegraph, an outstanding newspaperman and a fine American, points to the tape recording of how the Russians plotted to shoot down an unarmed U.S. transport plane as a justification for my disapproval of the red carpet treatment recently given to Mikoyan in this country.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRIDGES RIGHT AGAIN

New Hampshire's Senator STYLES BRIDGES was almost alone among his colleagues, a few weeks ago, when he scored the red carpet treatment given Anastas Mikoyan, Russian leader, by U.S. businessmen. BRIDGES was called everything by some, principally for attempting to throw a roadblock into possible peaceful U.S.-Russian relations.

The tape recorder incident, showing how Russians deliberately shot down a U.S. plane seems to indicate that they never will have good relations with us and that Senator BRIDGES has sized them up pretty well, all along for many years.

He says:

"On January 17, 1959, I rose on the floor of the U.S. Senate to deplore the red carpet treatment accorded Deputy Premier Mikoyan by some of our industrialists and Wall Street bankers. I also decried the action of some of my senatorial colleagues who had seen fit to honor and to lunch with Mikoyan under the very dome of the U.S. Capitol, that citadel of freedom and beacon light to the free world. I stood almost alone on the floor that day in upholding my position but I was not disturbed because I knew full well that it would eventually be justified.

"I yet did not realize how soon my stand would be vindicated. Today's shocking and incontrovertible revelation by our State Department should be proof enough to anyone that Soviet duplicity and ruthlessness are still the order of the day and that Mikoyan's visit was one more cheap Soviet ruse. My patriotic blood was never more stirred than when I heard the tape recording of the Russian duck shoot, over Armenia, of our unarmed transport plane. Feeling as I do myself, the feelings of the mothers, fathers, wives, children, and friends of our airmen must be indescribable.

"In my Senate speech, I noted that 6 bodies of the 17 men aboard had been returned to us and I called upon Mikoyan for an accounting of the other 11. Mikoyan was also questioned by our State Department. In the light of the disclosed evidence, Mikoyan's replies that 'the plane had crashed' and that 'the Soviet Government had given all the information it had' only reveals continuing Soviet perfidy of the highest order.

"I could only wish that all who feted Mikoyan and all who thought the Russians could now be trusted in negotiation should have continually dinned in their ears the tape recording of this act of murder which was applauded by Soviet commanding officers and high officials."

Need for Economic Rehabilitation of Distressed Areas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ELIZABETH KEE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, recently, a friend of mine had the unhappy experience of being on hand for the distribution of surplus agricultural commodities in one of the counties of the Fifth Congressional District.

It was truly a heartbreaking scene. Able-bodied men, eager and willing to work, had to line up and await their turn to receive a limited supply of food for their families. Defeat and resignation were written on the faces of these men.

"For goodness sake, do everything you possibly can to help provide jobs for these men," my friend told me after this experience. "They want to work. It is a crying shame that jobs simply are not available."

Mr. Speaker, my primary job this year is to do everything I possibly can to help create new jobs in West Virginia. It is difficult at times to make people from other areas, which are not plagued by chronic unemployment, understand the gravity of the situation. Our two Senators—BYRD and RANDOLPH—are doing an excellent job of setting forth in the Senate the need for an economic rehabilitation program. I am convinced there is a much wider interest in the problem in the House now than there was last year.

A Federal program of loans and grants to enable areas such as West Virginia to attract new industries is an indispensable part of any overall coordinated program. But we must not overlook the fact that local initiative is another necessary ingredient.

Mr. Speaker, West Virginia has much to offer to industry. Our manpower supply is plentiful. The supply of coal for fuel is almost inexhaustible. Water is plentiful. Excellent transportation facilities bring the markets of the country within easy shipping distance of West Virginia.

These and other facts, which make our State an attractive location, must be made available to industry. The electric utilities and other industries, which realize that their progress is tied to that of the State as a whole, have done an outstanding job of industrial promotion. A number of counties have started industrial development committees.

Mr. Speaker, all of this activity, I believe, demonstrates a commendable resolve on the part of the people in my State to work ourselves out of the economic difficulty in which the State temporarily finds itself. I am sure these local groups would agree that a sensible, workable program of Federal assistance is essential. But I am sure they would further agree that to rely entirely upon the Federal Government would be a fatal mistake.

The bill which I am pushing in the House for the economic rehabilitation of distressed areas calls for a coordinated effort. No Federal handout is involved. Rather, it is a program that will help the States—and their subdivisions—to help themselves.

There can be no doubt that everyone would benefit from a program that would create new jobs for the thousands of men in West Virginia who cannot find gainful employment. Mr. Speaker, the investment in dollars would be repaid many times over. Just think of the tax revenue that would be generated by an additional 200,000 jobs in the State and how great the demand would be for new services. Each new dollar in wages thus created would circulate many times through the economy.

I am convinced that during the months ahead we will see much progress in West Virginia toward working our way out of our present economic difficulties. Eventually, we will build in West Virginia an economy based upon widely diversified industries, providing jobs for men who are now displaced by machines and technological advancements.

Support for a Needed Move To Preserve Padre Island in the Gulf of Mexico

OF
HON. RALPH YARBOROUGH
OF TEXAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the first bill which I introduced this session provided for the establishment of Padre Island, stretching along the coast of the Gulf of Mexico between Corpus Christi and Brownsville, Tex., as a national park.

This island features some of the finest beaches to be found anywhere in our United States. In addition, they are almost in the same State as they were when the Karankawa Indians lived on the island, when the Spanish explorer Alonso Alvarez de Pineda set foot on the shores in 1519, to be followed by Cabeza de Vaca, David Ingram, and others, and when a young lieutenant named George G. Meade sailed down Laguna Madre on the island's landward side to see if Gen. Zachary Taylor could take his artillery to Mexico by water.

It is an unfortunate truth that in many sections of our country the shoreline has vanished from public use. According to a national survey, only 240 miles of the 3,700 miles of shoreline constituting the Atlantic and Gulf coasts are in Federal and State ownership for public recreation use.

I believe a national park on Padre Island is sorely needed to preserve some of our coastline for the enjoyment of all. If it is made a park, I confidently predict Padre Island will become a winter playground for the Nation.

What better place could there be than this sandy island on which Texas longhorns once grazed and where one can still visit the wrecked hulls of fishing boats and pick up glass colored by the sun marking the sites of towns established here by early settlers? The story of the centuries lends flavor to this island, rich in legend of Indians, pirate treasure, explorers, soldiers, cowmen, and fishermen and sailors.

In addition, the island provides sanctuary for birds and wildlife and the water around it yields fine surf fishing.

Its unique combination of geographical formations, scenery, history, climate, and wildlife cannot be duplicated anywhere else in the Nation.

Mr. President, in further support of my reasons for wanting to preserve this last substantial strip of the American coastline which is still almost entirely in its natural State, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a resolution of the Guild of the Houston (Tex.) Museum of Natural History, of February 9, 1959.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF GUILD OF HOUSTON, TEX., MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY, FEBRUARY 9, 1959

The Guild of the Houston Museum of Natural History recognizes that Padre Island is unique in that it is the longest sand barrier island in the world; that its dunes and sand beaches are the finest along the gulf coast; that bird values are outstanding and its marine life fascinating; and that its historical and recreational values are important.

It recognizes also that the island is largely unspoiled but that easy accessibility, due to three causeways, will soon destroy its natural beauty and its value for public recreation and study: Therefore

Resolved, That this organization go on record as favoring the acquisition of Padre Island for public recreation and for conservation of its beauty and study values.

Resolved further, That this guild take whatever action seems expedient to bring about the perpetuity of the island in its natural state.

Mr. J. Francis Smith

OF

HON. JOHN S. MONAGAN

OF CONNECTICUT

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. MONAGAN. Mr. Speaker, J. Francis Smith, of Waterbury, Conn., died on February 5, 1959. Mr. Smith was one of the most prominent men of his generation in Waterbury and in the State of Connecticut. He was active in the political field, in the business field, and in the field of community activities. He gave generously of himself in activities which benefited the public and brought him no return other than the satisfaction of knowing that he had contributed to the welfare of his fellow man. His death will be a great loss to his community and to the State of Connecticut.

Mr. Smith was chairman of the first Waterbury U.S. savings bond drive during World War II and also headed the first Waterbury Community Chest drive.

He was a member of the boards of directors of many companies, including Connecticut Light & Power, and First Federal Savings & Loan Association. He was chairman of the advisory board of the Waterbury Trust Office and honorary director of the Connecticut National Bank with which Waterbury Trust is affiliated.

Mr. Smith was also a director of the Small Tube Products, Inc., now of Altoona, Pa.; the United Corp. of New York; True-Temper Corp., Cleveland, Ohio; the old Waterbury Farrel Foundry & Machine Co.; now a division of Textron, Inc.; and a former director of the New Haven Railroad.

BUSINESS INTERESTS

In addition to heading the lumber company founded by his father, he was president of the Waterbury Ready Mixed Concrete Co., and Connecticut Wholesale Supply Co. He was president at one time of the Northwestern Lumber Dealers Association and the Connecticut Lumber Dealers Association.

A graduate of Driggs School, Crosby High School, and Dartmouth College, he developed an interest in tennis as a boy, and developed his skill in the sport to win many championships. He was on the Dartmouth tennis team, was winner of the Waterbury city tennis championship nine times, the State doubles championship three times, and also the southern New England championship. In recent years he had been rated as an excellent golf player. He was always considered the most outstanding tennis player developed in Waterbury.

ACTIVE IN POLITICS

Mr. Smith was elected secretary of the Democratic State central committee in 1932 and became chairman in 1934.

Gov. Abraham Ribicoff said of Mr. Smith:

The death of J. Francis Smith is a great loss to all of us. Throughout the years, he has been a close personal friend and adviser. Fran was an outstanding citizen of our State, who always gave of himself to the civic, religious, charitable, and political life of his community. He served the people well.

Mrs. Ribicoff joins me in extending deepest sympathy to Mrs. Smith and the other members of his family. The State of Connecticut will mourn him and miss him throughout the coming years.

LAUDED BY FARLEY

Hon. James A. Farley, former Postmaster General and former chairman of the Democratic National Committee said of Mr. Smith:

News of the sudden death of Fran Smith shocks me, as I had recently talked with one of his brothers, who indicated some progress and imminent release from the hospital. For many years, I have had tremendous admiration and genuine affection for Fran Smith.

There never was any doubt as to his position on any issue. He was never a middle-of-the-roader, which convinced me more than ever, if the Democratic Party in every State had one leader like him, the party would be much stronger.

He had the admiration and respect of everyone with whom he came into contact. I've always enjoyed working with him and it was always a delight, in recent years to talk with him when he came to New York City, or by telephone at his office in Waterbury. My sincere condolences go to his brothers and his family.

U.S. Senator THOMAS J. DODD said of Mr. Smith:

Fran Smith was a great and dear friend of mine for 27 years. His untimely death comes as a great loss to me.

He was a brilliant man and always a clear thinker. He was a man dedicated to his country and the greatest State chairman either party ever had.

He was always a most charitable person and a man of the highest integrity.

His passing is a great loss to Waterbury and Connecticut, and I wish to express my sincere sympathy to his family.

U.S. Senator PRESCOTT BUSH said of Mr. Smith:

I am saddened by the news of the death of J. Francis Smith. The State of Connecticut and the city of Waterbury have lost one of their most distinguished and public-spirited citizens. I extend the sympathy of Mrs. Bush and myself to members of his family at this most difficult time.

Hon. John M. Bailey, chairman of the Democratic State central committee, said of Mr. Smith:

J. Francis Smith's death was a shock to many of us. He had many friends throughout the State. I have lost a close personal friend of long standing, and also a man who was a valued adviser to me as chairman of the Democratic State central committee. The State has indeed lost a valued citizen in the passing of J. Francis Smith.

Former Mayor Edward D. Bergin, chairman of the Waterbury Democratic Town Committee, said of Mr. Smith:

The untimely death of Francis Smith is a real loss to the city of Waterbury. A man of keen intellect, sound judgment, and decisive, direct action, his influence, though little publicized, has been widely felt in all phases of our community life.

His firm adherence to the basic principles of our democratic system of government will be missed in the Democratic Party.

Mayor Raymond E. Snyder said of Mr. Smith:

Mrs. Snyder and I are deeply shocked to hear of the sudden death of J. Francis Smith. His passing has left a void that will be felt by all who have ever known or met him. J. Francis Smith's gentlemanly behavior and wise counsel have won the admiration and respect of all who have known him on the political scene, in civic matters, and in business. There have been few such dedicated men. It is a great loss.

Francis Smith was my dear friend. My interest in public service came solely from him. From my boyhood he advised and stimulated me. He was one person who had the stature to give disinterested advice. I admired his brilliant mind, his independence of thought, his courage, and his idealism.

He was a big man in a time of little men. He had the capacity to cut through any problem to its essentials and to make its solution come easy. He brought to political life an idealism and a concentration on the long views which have too often been obscured in these days of mass thinking. He gave generously of his time and energy in the effort to turn political movements in the direction of principle and away from expediency.

The success of our democratic system requires active participation by its citizens.

If all men gave as prodigally of their talents to the public welfare as did Francis Smith, the future security of our country would be much more certain.

The following is an editorial from the Waterbury Republican on February 6, 1959:

J. FRANCIS SMITH

Our city and the State are made poorer indeed by the untimely death of an outstanding businessman and citizen.

There is a sad irony in J. Francis Smith's death. He had apparently made a strong recovery a couple of years ago from a long, serious sickness, had resumed control of his business affairs, and, in managing Senator THOMAS DODD's campaign for the Democratic nomination, had shown last summer that he still possessed an old political warrior's skill. Then came the heart attack which, after weeks in the hospital, has claimed his life.

A hardheaded sense of what was practical guided him. His was a fierce competitive spirit, shown on the tennis court when he was younger, later on the links, and carried over into business, politics, community service. He had a shrewd, analytical mind. His success as president of J. E. Smith & Co. led to other business connections, to bank and corporation directorship and trade association honors. On the political side, his service as Democratic State chairman when the late Wilbur L. Cross was Governor was a very distinguished one, and the part he played over the whole political range from local to national was notable.

As drive chairman for community causes and worker for community betterment he had no superior and few peers. However much you might narrow down a list of pivotal local leaders in business, in politics, and in movements for civic improvement, his name would be bound to be there.

Such men are few, precious, hard to spare.

The following is an editorial from the Waterbury American of February 6, 1959:

J. FRANCIS SMITH

J. Francis Smith was an outstanding man in his generation in Waterbury. He had varied interests, and he served in many capacities; and in practically everything in which he engaged he was successful.

In the business world he was known as a leader of men. The lumber industry nationally recognized him as a person of unusual attainments, and called on him to provide capable direction to many industrywide movements. In politics his record is unrivaled by any person in Waterbury in the past several decades.

Not only in Waterbury but in statewide politics he proved himself a master organizer. And even after ill health had forced him to retire from that field for a number of years, it took him only a few short months to demonstrate, through the nomination of THOMAS J. DODD for the Senate, that he still had the magic touch to win.

In public life, otherwise, Mr. Smith gave his talents willingly to forward projects that were for the common good. Two firsts tell the story. He was chairman of the first U.S. bond sale drive during World War II and first chairman of the community chest after that organization came into being. Of course both campaigns were outstanding successes. But in many instances Mr. Smith was happy to serve in a vigorous and able capacity behind the scenes. It was that way in politics, and it was that way again in aiding various agencies which worked for the community good.

Francis Smith was a man of positive character. In that virtue rested much of his success. He was a man for facts—getting facts and then appraising them in a most intelligent manner. Having done this, he mapped a campaign to attain his goal; and from then on he drove with powerful insistence toward a successful climax. Men in all walks of life valued his counsel. That his judgment was held high in financial circles was shown by the number of companies that invited him to serve as director.

Francis Smith was good for Waterbury. He gave a lot to the city. The city will suffer by his loss. Certainly he felt an example of public service that should be inspirational to all citizens.

The following is an editorial from the Naugatuck News of February 6, 1959:

J. FRANCIS SMITH

"The death of J. Francis Smith is a great loss to all of us."

Gov. Abraham A. Ribicoff said that as part of his tribute to an astute Waterbury business executive and State political leader who succumbed yesterday to a heart attack, at a time he appeared to be recovering from a serious illness.

The Governor's words were representative of the sentiments expressed with deep sincerity by business and political leaders in high echelons, including James A. Farley, former Postmaster General and National Democratic chairman; U.S. Senators Thomas J. Dodd and Prescott Bush; Congressman John S. Monagan; Waterbury Mayor Raymond E. Snyder and former Mayor Edward Bergin; and Mayor Adam Mengacci of Naugatuck.

All who knew him, and they were countless, marveled at his keen analytical mind, his driving power and organizational ability.

As an athlete in his younger years, as a financier and businessman, and in government and politics, he was a leader who had the capacity to cut through any problem to its essentials and make its solution come easy.

He came most prominently to the foreground of public activity as Democratic State chairman when the late Wilbur L. Cross was Governor. After several years of comparative inactivity he reentered the political arena last year to demonstrate his masterful touch as he managed the successful campaign of THOMAS DODD for U.S. Senator.

But his abilities were neither confined nor limited to politics and government; his was the opinion sought on a wide range of activities extending beyond the boundaries of city and State.

In many respects, Fran Smith was a genius and he gave willingly of his talents in community causes, as well as in the other fields in which he was prominently identified.

The Gleaner and Journal—50 Years of Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, if cities and communities are to progress they must be the recipients of up-to-date news coverage. The citizens of the Second Congressional District of Kentucky are fortunate in being served by newspapers whose editors and owners are men and women of exceptional ability and character, capable of disseminating the news in an interesting and unbiased manner. One of the outstanding newspapers in my district is the Gleaner and Journal, of Henderson, Ky. The Gleaner and Journal this month celebrated its 50th anniversary.

On February 9, 1909, Mr. Leigh Harris brought his family to Henderson, Ky., from the State of Illinois. Several weeks previously he had purchased a newspaper then called the Journal. Subsequently another newspaper in Henderson, known as the Gleaner, was consolidated with the Journal, and thus the Gleaner and Journal came into being. After arriving in Henderson, Mr. Harris' first editorial, now world famous, consisted of the following sentence:

I have come to Henderson to run a newspaper.

And until his retirement, in 1950, he ably edited and published the Gleaner and Journal. Mr. Harris possessed firm beliefs and convictions, but this fact did not deter him from imparting in his paper true facts and events as they actually transpired. He was a dedicated citizen, who gave of his talents, time, and efforts to the betterment of his community.

The two great interests in Mr. Harris' life were his newspaper and his family. Love for his work was only exceeded by devotion to his wife and children. And, fortunately, he has passed on to his children the freshness of the deep springs of life, a quality of imagination and vigor of emotions. His daughter, Francele Harris Armstrong, as editor of the Gleaner and Journal, is now guiding its policies with a firm and efficient hand.

Kentucky and the Second Congressional District owe a debt of gratitude to such gentlemen as the late Mr. Leigh Harris, who, in their journalistic capacities and through the medium of their newspapers, have made our communities and our entire Nation a better place in which to live.

Public Law 480

OF
HON. ODIN LANGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. LANGEN. Mr. Speaker, today I should like to add my voice to the voices of certain of my colleagues by introducing an amendment to the Agricultural Trade Development Assistance Act of 1954, commonly known as Public Law 480, which would permit this act to operate for 5 years without need of congressional action.

At a time when our farms are involved in the largest production in our history, we find nations all over the world in need of these products, while we at the same time are lamenting their existence. This law was enacted for the sole purpose of expediting this situation; it was enacted to permit our Nation to provide for those countries in need of our commodities. This is possible in a manner not calculated to upset or hinder their economies, but rather in a fashion which will enable them to purchase what they need, when they need it, in a sound economic and businesslike fashion. We, by the same token, as a nation are profiting in a bilateral capacity. We are able to sell our excess products for currency or credit on the international market, while reducing the surpluses presently costing the Government millions of dollars in storage.

Public Law 480 has provided this Nation with the opportunity of winning countless friends among the nations of the world where a food deficit is in existence. It has permitted disposal of approximately $5 billion of surpluses on the world market from our markets. This program has served us well; it has stood the test of almost 5 years, and has proven itself to be one of the better laws passed by the Congress when one evaluates its results on the domestic agricultural market and its benefits to our farm families.

I have introduced this amendment because I feel a program which has proved its worth in this manner should no longer be restricted by year-to-year operation. Effective as this provision has been in its present form, it stands to reason that long-range commitments by the Department of Agriculture could better be made and utilized if the Department could make assurances of delivery, as permitted by this amendment.

Because of the effect of Public Law 480 on our international policies and because of the advantageous effect it has on our farm economy, I urge the favorable consideration of this amendment.

The Paragould, Ark., Kiwanis Club

OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 9, Representative GEORGE P. MILLER placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a most splendid report on the fine work of the Newark, Calif., Kiwanis Club. It was pointed out by Mr. MILLER that in the city of Newark the Kiwanis have devoted some 2,400 man-hours to civic and charitable endeavors.

This is characteristic of the Kiwanis Clubs of America. As indicative, may I call attention to the 2,983 man-hours of community building by the Paragould, Ark., Kiwanis Club. Paragould, located in Greene County, Ark., has three active civic organizations, of which the Kiwanis is one. During 1958, working together, the members of the Paragould Kiwanis Club devoted themselves to the following activities:

BOYS' AND GIRLS' WORK

First. Sponsored local Explorer Scout Troop furnishing advisor, institutional representative, committeemen, and financial aid.

Second. Sponsored little league baseball team and Pee Wee basketball team, furnishing uniforms, manager, and coaches.

Third. Sponsored Key Club at Paragould High School.

Fourth. Donated over 50 percent of all foodstuffs, toys, and clothing used by Goodfellows, Inc., for Christmas baskets.

Fifth. Served as "newsboys" selling papers for Christmas baskets.

Sixth. Fifty new toys donated to Goodfellows, Inc., for use in baskets for the needy.

Seventh. Leased 40 acres of wooded land with stocked pond for use of the scouts.

Eighth. Sponsored representative at Boys and Girls State.

Ninth. Gave registered Duroc pigs to deserving 4–H students.

Tenth. Kiwanian served as chairman for city's annual Christmas parade.

Eleventh. The club was the recipient of Kiwanis Appreciation Day give by high school.

Twelfth. Assisted in manning concession stands at football games.

Thirteenth. Assisted in fund drive for Boy and Girl Scouts.

PUBLIC AND BUSINESS AFFAIRS

First. A Kiwanian was selected as Citizen of the Year.

Second. Worked with local chamber of commerce in all civic affairs.

Third. Assisted with securing full-time employed for physically handicapped and students during summer months.

Fourth. Members manned gates for county fair.

Fifth. Met with county RCI clubs furnishing speaker on farm safety, soil conservation, and international farm exchange student.

Sixth. Participation in 4–H contests and banquets.

Seventh. Awarded an additional prize for 4–H pigs shown at county fair.

Eighth. Participated in Dairy Day.

VOCATIONAL GUIDANCE

First. Assisted school officials in setting up industrial tours.

Second. Presented club scholarship to outstanding student.

Third. Honored all local teachers with teachers appreciation banquet.

Fourth. Recognized 10th-, 11th-, and 12th-grade honor students with scholastic achievement banquet.

Fifth. Furnished club counselors for students in selecting occupations.

SUPPORT OF CHURCHES

First. Furnished public eating places with prayer cards.

Second. Furnished hotels and motels with "Attend Church Regularly" signs.

Third. Members serve individual churches as officers, teachers, and lay speakers.

Fourth. Erected road signs urging church attendance.

The primary objective of the Kiwanians of Paragould is to serve underprivileged children. During 1958 the Kiwanis Club of Paragould bought shoes, clothing, groceries, school lunches, books, dental work, and glasses as a part of this program. The club paid graduation expenses for needy senior students as well as medical expenses of children and their transportation to the Crippled Childrens Hospital. Through the untiring efforts of the Kiwanis Club and with the assistance of a city noted for its generosity, 197 needy and indigent children received vital assistance.

And, what is the purpose behind all this work? I believe that President Walter J. "Bud" Branch, affable head of the Paragould Kiwanis Club, makes good answer:

> We ask not for commendation or reward but rather to offer thanks that we are in a position to give assistance, realizing but for the grace of God we could very well be the recipients of these things we now give to others.

These are the men who make America great. Voluntarily, and because of their faith in a God who inspires them, they work in Paragould—in Newark—and in other communities of this land to make a better life for their fellows.

All-American Athlete From All America City

OF
HON. KEN HECHLER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, in these times when juvenile delinquency is so frequently mentioned on the front pages of our newspapers, I am happy to commend to your attention a young man of an entirely different sort, a young man whose courage, faith, and determination make him a living symbol of all that is decent in America's youth.

The young man is named Leo Byrd. At this time, he is climaxing a sterling scholastic and collegiate basketball career at Marshall College in my hometown of Huntington, W. Va.

As major colleges go, Marshall is not a very large one, and as collegiate basketball players go, Leo Byrd is rather on the small side. But in character, talent, and personality, Leo's stature is tall indeed.

When Leo Byrd was 12 years old, the dreams of basketball glory he had cherished since babyhood seemed turned to dust. He was a patient in a hospital, stricken with poliomyelitis and partially paralyzed.

Many a boy would have accepted defeat at this point, but Leo did not. As soon as he was able to get up, he started running and training to strengthen his weakened legs, although he says "This hurt me a lot, but I wouldn't let them know."

He recovered sufficiently to play junior high school and later high school basketball. His first 3 years of high school competition were comparatively undistinguished, and even as he played through his senior year, he did not enjoy the publicity accolades often accorded promising young players.

His star soared cometlike into the heavens, however, in the 1955 West Virginia High School tournament. Leading a lightly regarded Huntington High School team into the event, he broke the existing tournament record for scoring by making 48 points in a game that eliminated the school that had won 4 consecutive State championships. The following night he snapped his own record with a 49-point performance, and proved to be the star of the tournament.

Later that spring, he was named "Mr. Basketball USA" after appearing in an intersectional high school all-star game.

Leo enrolled at Marshall College, only a few blocks from his home, after spurning the offers of glittering scholarships from other schools.

Here he has brought continuing credit to his family, his school, and his community. Under the tutelage of Jule Rivlin, Marshall's able basketball coach, he has blossomed into a universally respected college star. His basket-shooting ability is regarded as almost uncanny, and although he is only 6 feet, 1 inch tall, he relies on aggressiveness and remarkable coordination to outplay men far taller than he.

Last year, Leo Byrd teamed up with Hal Greer, the first Negro player in Marshall hisory, to give his squad an awesome scoring attack. With Greer gone, and winning fame as a professional player with Syracuse, Leo has done a remarkable job of carrying the offensive load for his team this year.

All season long, he has remained near the top among the Nation's scorers. As I speak today, he is second in the Nation only to Cincinnati's widely acclaimed Oscar Robertson. Leo never lets down. In fact, his scoring ability has improved as the season has progressed.

As glamorous as Leo Byrd's career has been, his personal life, however, is at least equal to it in stature.

He is modest and unassuming, yet talks about his basketball feats frankly and with great sincerity if asked.

He is the son of a Methodist minister, Rev. Joseph P. Byrd, who was himself a versatile college athlete. The Christian training of Byrd's early days have remained with him. He is universally saluted by his opponents for his clean play and good sportsmanship.

A former leader in the youth fellowship in his father's church, Leo has kept religion as his guide, and before each Marshall game, Leo leads his teammates in prayer.

The city of Huntington this year was one of the few American communities honored with an All America Award. The community is justly proud of its civic progress. And Huntingtonians also may take great pride in the fact that Leo Byrd, a native son who elected to stay in his hometown for a sparkling collegiate athletic career, seems a sure bet to collect some all-American honors himself at the close of the basketball season.

Boy Scout Week

OF
HON. WILLIAM H. AVERY
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, last week 12 Explorer Scouts made an official report to the Nation representing the 3½ million Boy Scouts of American. Naturally I was proud to have a Scout from my own district, Steven D. Peterson from Topeka, Kans. It was my privilege to attend a special breakfast honoring these Scouts on last Tuesday and I would like to observe that it is reassuring to see 12 such fine and capable young men representing the youth of America. The Nation owes a special tribute to the 125,000 volunteer leaders of the Scout organization. It is by virtue of the unselfish and tireless effort of these public-spirited citizens that we are able to attract our youth into the Boy Scout organization.

On Sunday, February 15 many churches throughout the Nation appropriately paid tribute and recognized the Boy Scouts of America. Many churches are counted among the 81,000 organizations sponsoring Boy Scout troops throughout the land. In many instances the church makes their facilities available to Scout troops for a place of meeting even though the troop may be sponsored by a nonsecular organization.

In recognizing the Boy Scouts of America it was a common practice for a Boy Scout to be selected to deliver what is described as the Patrick Henry address during one of the church services. Typical of the Scouts selected to make this address was Bob Singleton, of Bethesda, Md., who spoke during the church service at the Bethesda Methodist Church. Bob was presented by the Reverend Marion S. Michael.

Abraham Lincoln

OF
HON. ELIZABETH KEE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include a copy of my newsletter which was released today:

KEENOTES

(By Representative ELIZABETH KEE)

Congress suspended its deliberations on Thursday, February 12, to observe the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. Carl Sandburg, the famed poet and author of a monumental biography of the Civil War President, spoke at a joint session of the Senate and House.

Lincoln was the founder of the Republican Party. His birthday each year is the occasion for party dinners throughout the country, at which funds to finance future campaigns are raised. Democrats use the birthdays of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson for their fundraising events.

But Lincoln does not belong to the Republican Party, just as Jefferson and Jackson are not the exclusive property of the Democrats. These great Americans belong to the entire country and they are revered and remembered by all of us, regardless of party.

There can be no denying the fact that Lincoln was a great man. His was a tragic life and the sense of doom, of impending tragedy, which haunted him his entire adult life, became a reality when John Wilkes Booth put a bullet through his body in Ford's Theater in Washington. Lincoln had a devotion to the Union which guided his public life. He had to lead this Nation through a bloody and cruel Civil War in which 500,000 men on both sides fell, to prove the insolubility of the Union.

Lincoln was a vilified President. The cruel, bitter things which were said about him when he was President are almost beyond belief today. He was pictured in cartoons as an ape, a monster, and a maniac.

Lincoln was a noble soul. There was a touch of the poet about him. In an age of florid prose, he spoke and wrote in simple terms. He was preceded on the platform at Gettysburg by Charles Sumner who spoke for 2 hours. Lincoln spoke for 5 minutes. What Sumner said was forgotten; Lincoln's Gettysburg Address has attained immortality, a masterpiece of prose, a speech which every schoolchild has to learn by heart.

All of Lincoln's speeches were memorable. He coined phrases which are quoted as the epitome of wisdom. Yet he was a modest man. He had grave doubts of his ability to govern the country in its most trying hour.

Lincoln was a masterful politician. Surrounded by a hostile and disloyal Cabinet, imposed upon him by his party, he persevered, outmaneuvered and, in the end, had his way. He fought with Congress and firmly established the precedent of a strong President—the head of a coequal branch of the Government as the Constitution decreed.

Upon his death people forgot the cruel, unkind things said about Lincoln. Instead they remembered his nobility, his long suffering to hold the Union together. Men wept openly in the streets of Washington upon learning the sad news. They realized the Nation faced a period of adjustment, of binding up the Nation's wounds, as critical and dangerous as the war period. They were afraid of that future without the steady hand of Lincoln at the helm.

How the course of history might have been changed had this man been spared. He wanted to bring the South back into the Union. He sought no vengeance. Had he lived, the South would have escaped the indignities and humiliations which were forced upon her by radicals bent upon revenge. Had Lincoln lived, the South would not have turned to counterviolence. The Nation could well have been spared a legacy of hate and suspicion which is still with us today.

It is fitting and proper that the birthday of our great heroes be observed each year. Lincoln, Jefferson, Jackson—these and others who built this country—have much to teach us today. It is unfortunate that we have not learned better the lessons of the past.

Gordon E. Dunn of the Miami Hurricane Forecast Center—Citation

OF
HON. DANTE B. FASCELL
OF FLORIDA
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, it is always pleasant to note recognition given to an outstanding public servant. Mr. Gordon E. Dunn, Weather Bureau meteorologist in charge of the Miami Hurricane Forecast Center, today received a Department of Commerce Gold Medal Citation for his outstanding contributions to the public service in the field of hurricane warnings.

We in the community have for some time considered his ability and experience in this field of great value to the areas served by the Miami center and are particularly pleased to see that the agency of which he is a part has presented to him this award.

Washington Report

OF

HON. BRUCE ALGER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newsletter of February 14, 1959:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth Congressional District, Texas)

Capitol activity this week centered around a joint session of Congress on Thursday called to pay tribute to the memory of Abraham Lincoln on the 150th anniversary of his birth.

In this week's newsletter, instead of talking about Lincoln, perhaps we might all benefit more by letting Mr. Lincoln talk to us about citizenship and government:

GOVERNMENT

"The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done, but cannot do at all, or cannot so well do, for themselves, in their separate and individual capacities.

"In all that the people can individually do as well for themselves, government ought not to interfere" (July 1, 1854).

DUTY

"We hold the true republican position. In leaving the people's business in their hands we cannot be wrong" (Congress, July 27, 1848).

SOLVENCY

"As an individual who undertakes to live by borrowing soon finds his original means devoured by interest, and next, no one left to borrow from, so must it be with a government" (Whig circular, March 4, 1843).

ECONOMIC FREEDOM

"I believe each individual is naturally entitled to do as he pleases with himself and the fruit of his labor, so far as it in no wise interferes with any other man's rights" (Chicago, Ill., July 10, 1858).

"We see it, and to us it appears like principle, and the best sort of principle at that—the principle of allowing the people to do as they please with their own business," Congress, July 27, 1848.

"The primary cause of our great prosperity * * * is the principle of 'Liberty to all'—the principle that clears the path for all—gives hope to all—and, by consequence, enterprise and industry to all," Fragment on the Constitution and Union, January 1861.

LIBERTY AND SECURITY

"If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a Nation of free men, we must live through all time or die by suicide," speech to Young Men's Lyceum, January 27, 1838.

CAPITAL/LABOR

"The strongest bond of human sympathy, outside of the family relation, should be one uniting all working people, of all nations, and tongues, and kindreds. Nor should this lead to a war upon property, or the owners of property. Property is the fruit of labor—property is desirable—is a positive good in the world. That some should be rich shows that others may become rich, and hence is just encouragement to industry and enterprise. Let not him who is houseless pull down the house of another; but let him labor diligently and build one for himself, thus by example assuring that his own shall be safe from violence when built," to New York Workingmen's Democratic Republican Association, March 21, 1864.

"I don't believe in a law to prevent a man from getting rich; it would do more harm than good. So while we do not propose any war upon capital, we do wish to allow the humblest man an equal chance to get rich with everybody else. When one starts poor, as most do in the race of life, free society is such that he knows he can better his condition; he knows that there is no fixed condition of labor, for his whole life," March 6, 1860.

DEPENDENCE ON GOD

"The purposes of the Almighty are perfect, and must prevail, though we erring mortals may fail to accurately perceive them in advance. We hoped for a happy termination of this terrible war long before this but God knows best, and has ruled otherwise. We shall yet acknowledge His Wisdom and our own error therein," to Mrs. Gurney, September 4, 1864.

DUTY

"Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith, let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it," at Cooper Institute, New York City, February 27, 1860.

Appreciation Dinner in Honor of Hon. William R. Williams, Former Member of House of Representatives

OF

HON. ALEXANDER PIRNIE

OF NEW YORK

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. PIRNIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I should like to include the text of an address given by me February 10, 1959, at Oneida, N.Y., on the occasion of an appreciation dinner in honor of the long and devoted public service of the Honorable William R. Williams, formerly a Representative of this esteemed body, sponsored by his friends and associates of Madison County, N.Y.:

One hundred and fifty years will have passed on February 12, 1959 since Abraham Lincoln was born in a log cabin of backwoods Kentucky. There was little at the time to suggest that the event was of any great significance, even in Hardin County where it happened. There wasn't one, excepting possibly the courageous, saintly mother, who dreamed that life had been breathed into a soul that, in the short span of 56 years, would experience the heartaches of poverty, abuse, and disappointment, and yet the glory of high responsibilities, inspired leadership and supreme martyrdom. Yes, no great American ever was ushered into this world with so little promise—yet the story of his life is really the story of our country—an expression of all that is basic and true in our way of life. It is fitting, therefore, that all America pause on this special anniversary to glimpse once again the nobility of the man and the eternal wisdom of his philosophy. While the noble Lincoln made richer the heritage of all Americans, to those of us who continue the Republican Party which he founded, he passed on a torch of dedicated leadership. It does us a great honor but imposes upon us a heavy responsibility. Our task would be performed, our obligation fully met if we were to apply to the problems of this day, the simple honesty, the tolerant understanding and quiet courage of our great founder. He dared to do what he believed to be right—sometimes he felt only God approved what he was doing, and in his darkest hours maybe he wasn't so sure he had that approval, but he held fast against all the forces which would divide and destroy our country. It would confer a great blessing upon us all if we could relive the struggle of his 56 years so that we might more fully understand his sense of values, so that we might more readily appreciate the dangers of which he warned and so that we might rededicate ourselves to the task which is ahead. The party of Lincoln can and must remain faithful to its trust, worthy of its founder.

There is a symbolic adherence to that trust in the life and service of the great Republican we especially honor tonight, our own Bill Williams. Approximately 75 years ago this rugged stalwart breathed first the invigorating air of Madison County. There was little in his early days to suggest the distinguished service which he was to render. He says he was so busy chasing Indians and panthers that he didn't have time for extensive schooling, but the truth is—Bill has attended school all his life—observing, thinking, and applying his common sense to each situation as it arose. I'm reminded of what Robert Burns, the Scotch poet, so well said—"Give me a spark of nature's fire—it's all the learning I require." Surely Bill Williams had that spark which he kindled into a flame by hard work, rugged honesty and hearty friendliness. Speaking as I am to those who have followed his career, marked by over 25 years of public service as a State legislator, as sheriff and a Congressman, I need not remind you that he never lost an election, nor did he ever lose his head. Popularity and good fortune never gave him any false notions of grandeur—he remained jovial and approachable. He sensed that with added responsibilities came opportunities for greater service which he was proud and glad to render. Years of working for the people have brought countless friendships. During the past campaign, I had the privilege of seeing and hearing the expressions of those friendships. I will retain in my memory always that striding form, the friendly, lively countenance, the campaign hat which looked as though its wearer was going backward as he strode along the street, in and out of buildings, retracing campaign trails of former years, proud and happy that he was so enthusiastically remembered. I said then and I repeat it now—Bill Williams was reaping and enjoying the greatest reward of public service, the devoted appreciation of those whom you've tried to serve.

During the past few weeks I have been privileged to be with many of Bill's old friends in the Congress and, to a man, these former colleagues have spoken earnestly of his friendliness and dependability as he worked with them for sound Republican principles. He was a man of his word and applied common sense to the solution of many different problems. His unfailing good humor carried him through many a trying situation. It may interest you to hear the very words used by his colleague in describing their impressions of his character and services as set forth in letters I've just received.

(At this time communications from the Honorable CHARLES A. HALLECK, the Honorable HAROLD OSTERTAG, the Honorable JOHN TABER, the Honorable CHARLES HOEVEN, and the Honorable R. WALTER RIEHLMAN, were read and presented to Mr. Williams.)

There is still another chapter. When personal considerations dictated withdrawal from his Washington duties, all of us hoped he would remain an active force in our party and that he would continue his close associations on the local scene. The sad death of Oneida County's Republican chairman necessitated choice of a new leader and Bill became the unanimous choice for this very important job. With vigor and a sincere purpose he is on the way to new achievements.

So it is that Bill Williams has brought honor and distinction to his party. As Republicans and as Americans we are proud that the tradition of Lincoln has been so faithfully followed by him whom we honor. However, he would not want this event to be simply an occasion of praise. We will do him far greater honor if we accept his contribution as a strong and enduring link in the great chain of dedicated service which began with our great Lincoln and which we must continue so that this country may remain strong, united, and free.

The Federal Penal System

OF

HON. KENNETH J. GRAY

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, due to overcrowding in our Federal penal system, the U.S. Bureau of Prisons has submitted an urgent request to Congress for funds with which to construct a maximum security Federal penitentiary. The budget request submitted to Congress is not to exceed $9,875,000.

In an effort to discredit the need for this maximum security penitentiary, the Wall Street Journal has printed an editorial listing the cost at $110 million. This, of course, is grossly in error. In order to set the record straight, I have asked the Wall Street Journal for a correction of their editorial and have written the letter below concerning this matter, and with permission previously granted, request that it be printed herein.

Should a prison riot occur in one of our overcrowded Federal prisons, far more damage could be done in one prison riot than the cost of the new proposed maximum security institution. Therefore, I hope Congress will favorably consider this urgent request for funds and ignore such efforts to discredit the urgent need for this new institution.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 16, 1959.

Mr. JOSEPH E. EVANS,
Wall Street Journal,
New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. EVANS: I would like to take this opportunity to point out an error which appeared in your editorial comments in Review and Outlook of the February 12 edition of your publication. You stated, and I quote, "The prison will house 600 men and the estimated cost of the Illinois prison is set at $110 million."

Mr. Evans, the figure of $110 million is $100 million in error. If you will check the printed budget request submitted by the President, on page 761 in the right column under the heading "Buildings and Facilities," you will find an item requesting moneys not to exceed $9,875,000 for this proposed prison. I am quite sure that you will agree this figure is quite different from the figure you quote in your editorial of February 12. Naturally, with this error the further figure of $183,333 per man used in your editorial is likewise in gross error.

I sincerely feel that, in justice to your readers who look to your publication and editorials for correct information, you will want to right this error at the earliest possible time. And, I might add, that the actual budget request for $9,875,000 might also change you editorial thinking on this matter.

If I can be of any further help to you in getting the factual information on this or any other matter, please do not hesitate to call on me.

With kindest regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,
KENNETH J. GRAY,
U.S. Congressman.

Wabash River Flood

OF

HON. FRED WAMPLER

OF INDIANA

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from my home in the Sixth District of Indiana, Terre Haute, where I surveyed the tragic amount of sheer waste and devastation caused by the rampaging floodwaters of the Wabash River.

The need for remedial flood-control construction in this area, Mr. Speaker, is desperately urgent. The annual human, agricultural, and property damage resulting from Wabash River floodings is incredible.

In the small town of Clinton, Ind., with a population slightly in excess of 5,000, where I witnessed that city's heroic flood-control efforts, the Wabash was being fought with 8,000 sandbags purchased by the local citizenry for 14 cents apiece. Those sandbags were not purchased this year, Mr. Speaker; they were bought several years ago, during a previous flood, and when the danger was past were emptied and stored so that they could be used again, when the Wabash River would inevitably threaten the area's people and their homes.

West Terre Haute has been flooded out 3 years running. Flood crestings are so frequent and so severe that Terre Haute no longer records flood levels at the 14-foot mark; the 20-foot level is now the only recorded level.

These few further word pictures, Mr. Speaker, can but only begin to describe the extent of the flood's devastation or to dramatize the urgent need for flood control planning and construction along the Wabash River. In Terre Haute, 80,000 sandbags have been used in an attempt to control the floodwaters, and the people of Terre Haute are still filling and using sandbags. In Attica, Ind., some 20 homes have been submerged. State Road 41, which is a national highway, is being swept by a 20-foot current. People in Williamsport, Ind., who travel but a mile and a half to 2 miles to work in Attica, are now being transported by helicopter, and should they be forced to drive, they would have to travel approximately 45 miles. People returning home from their working day find themselves looking for a place to sleep. The farmers of the area are currently uninterested in the question of price supports; they are more interested in looking for a piece of land to farm.

A copy of a telegram to the President, which I received this morning, I think graphically portrays the plight of the people along the Wabash. From Cara-Jean Baldwin, chairman, Parke County, Ind., chapter, and director of the Wabash Valley Association, the wire reads:

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington, D.C.:

We are experiencing the third flood in this territory in 5 weeks. After devastating damage of 1957 and 1958, our farmers cannot endure or gamble on planting 1959 crops without some assurance conditions will be corrected as soon as possible. All of this tragedy could have been averted with proper flood control in Wabash Valley. Implementation of funds for approved Mississinewa, Salomonie, and Huntington flood-control reservoirs with funds to expedite surveys and reports on Sugar Creek, Wildcat Creek, and Big Pine Creek would cost taxpayers millions less than flood damage costs year after year.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the Members of the House will fully appreciate the seriousness of the damaging flood conditions in the Wabash River area, and will lend their support to the efforts which I, and I feel sure, the other Members of the Indiana delegation, intend to make toward securing the appropriations necessary to start and hopefully complete flood-control construction along the Wabash River.

The 41st Anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day

OF

HON. HAROLD D. DONOHUE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. DONOHUE. Mr. Speaker, it was my honor and privilege, yesterday, to participate in exercises, commemorating the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day, which were held in Our Lady of Vilna Church Hall, Worcester, Mass.

The meeting and ceremonies were sponsored by the Committee for Commemoration of Lithuania's Independence, Joseph W. Glavickas, president;

Olga A. Kersis, secretary. The assemblage, which overran the capacity of the hall, consisted of the members of the two great local Lithuanian parishes of St. Casimir's, and Our Lady of Vilna, together with representatives from 55 other Lithuanian groups within our community.

In connection with this eventful occasion I have been requested to include in the RECORD resolutions unanimously adopted by the assembly, and speeches delivered by myself and Anthony J. Miller, a prominent Worcester attorney of Lithuanian descent; the resolutions and speeches follow:

THE 41ST ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY, WORCESTER, MASS.

(Speech Delivered by the Honorable HAROLD D. DONOHUE, of Massachusetts)

I am very glad, as your Representative in the Federal Congress, to again take part in these ceremonies commemorating another anniversary of the Declaration of Lithuanian Independence.

While this occasion necessarily and sorrowfully reminds us that Lithuania is still suffering under the cruel heel of Russian Communist imperialism, we are not gathered here in any atmosphere of casual surrender or regretful abandonment of the hope that Lithuania and her good people will eventually be freed.

We are, rather, assembled to voice our righteous protest of outrageous Communist conduct, and exert our best efforts to give heart to the courageous and long-suffering Lithuanian people for the continuation of their struggle against enslavement. Our confidence for the future of Lithuania is based in great part upon our knowledge of her past history.

You know, and I know, that at one time, and for a number of centuries, the Lithuanian kingdom was a powerful force for good in the whole of eastern Europe. The Lithuanians not only had succeeded in repelling the barbarian invaders from the East, but they were also the gallant champions, and formed the advance guard of Christianity in that part of Europe. A high place of respect and admiration for Lithuania among the nations of the world seemed to be assured.

The Lithuanian state came into being as an independent unit in the year 1253, more than 700 years ago. I do not have to recount to you her glorious history through the following centuries up to the tragic time, late in the 18th century, when she was ruthlessly absorbed into the old Russian Empire.

However, when World War I ended, Lithuania regained her independence and succeeded in reestablishing an individual national state, and proclaimed themselves as such on February 16, 1918, after 123 years of Russian domination.

During the long period of subjugation, the devout and dedicated people of Lithuania had persevered in their resistance to tyranny and faithfully preserved the heritage of faith and freedom.

It does not surprise us then that modern history shows that following that fateful February day in 1918 there was an immediate resurgence of national culture and a prompt expansion of her free institutions.

The Lithuanian people established a democratic form of government. Under it they prospered, economically, socially, and religiously.

Suddenly, on June 15, 1940, the Soviet Union violated all of its treaty commitments with Lithuania, and the Red army moved in. Without provocation or justification, and in utter contempt of international law and morality, the Communist Kremlin overran Lithuania, and the other independent Baltic countries, and installed regimes deliberately designed to destroy the newborn freedoms of all the peoples within those brave states.

Since that time, Soviet Russia has purposely used the whole force of its overpowering totalitarian might to exterminate the Lithuanian sense of nationhood. The Soviet system has been imposed and Lithuania has actually been incorporated in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Thousands of Lithuanians have been executed and hundreds of thousands have been shipped to slavery in Siberia.

Every conceivable barbarian effort has been made to suffocate the patriotic independent sentiment of the Lithuanian people.

Today our hearts and our minds are moved with compassion by the suffering and the persecution we know the good people of Lithuania are undergoing this very hour. At the same time, our minds and our hearts are inspired by them and for them because we also know they have bravely and gloriously survived and conquered other and earlier periods of cruel foreign tyranny.

The people of Lithuania are neither broken nor discouraged by the stark and terrible realities of oppression under which they now, unfortunately, live. The burning fever of basic liberty and freedom is heightened within them, not diminished, by their current adversity.

We know that their courage and their indomitable will to resist subjugation grows stronger with every outrage committed against them by those who seek to become the atheistic masters of their spirits as well as their bodies.

We in America take courage from the valor of the Lithuanian people. They are sustaining us by their example of devotion to our common cause.

They inspire us here, and her countless friends throughout the still free world, to remain true in our struggle to relieve Lithuania, and the other oppressed nations, from the Communist yoke.

We will continue the struggle with every resource at our command to overcome the godless scourge which is trying to enslave the whole world and which presently has unfortunate and gallant Lithuania within its horrible grasp.

Today we specially remind ourselves that no people anywhere have been more heroic nor fought more bravely against countless odds for liberty and freedom than the Lithuanian people. We are reminded that the destiny of Lithuania and her freedom-loving neighbors is linked with the future of America. We cannot ourselves expect to remain free if we do not exert every possible effort to promote the freedom of Lithuania.

Let us then here pledge ourselves to work unceasingly for the liberation of Lithuania and the other captive nations, and may divine providence grant that that glorious and Christian objective be accomplished in the near future.

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY, WORCESTER, MASS.

(Speech delivered by Attorney Anthony J. Miller)

As an American of Lithuanian descent, it is an honor for me to join with Congressman DONOHUE in this program commemorating the 41st anniversary of the Declaration of Lithuanian Independence.

I want to emphasize the word "independence" because, to my mind, and I am sure to yours, independence is not a matter to be dwelt upon or spoken about on only 1 day a year.

The history and tradition of Lithuanian independence is a living thing and a blessed thing within us and among us, except when we give sorrowful thought to our Lithuanian homeland and her unfortunate people.

On this occasion, we are reminded that the Russian Communists cannot stop or forbid this program, or any other similar exercises that are being held throughout the United States and in other free countries in honor and in respect to Lithuania.

Appreciating our own blessings as citizens of the United States, we should, therefore, not permit a day to pass without thinking and planning and praying for the time when our native land will be liberated from Communist tyranny.

As Americans, we know that the generous heart of this country has always welcomed and assisted exiles and refugees.

Because this Nation fought for its own independence, it encourages independence for others.

Because we, as Lithuanian descendants, have advanced in the United States, and because we have a part in the development of this country, we are thereby helping to sustain the strength of the Lithuanian homeland. I think that is a substantial hope and comfort to our friends and relatives there. They know that we have a voice, as good Americans, in the formation of American foreign policy so that it will never be permitted, by any possible subversives, to forget its moral obligation to work for the freedom of Lithuania and the other suppressed nations.

Some of our people appear to be worried about the development of American foreign policy. They feel that we may gradually forget Lithuania and the other Baltic victims of Red Russian conquests. They fear that we may be tempted to make a settlement with the Communists and that we may be fooled by an invitation to peacefully coexist.

Let me clearly state to you my opinion that so long as we have representatives like Mr. DONOHUE, and other fine Americans in our Government, neither the Congress nor the executive department will ever be fooled into such a betrayal. No diplomatic arrangement, no matter how convenient for the moment, would be tolerated by the American people whose traditional rule of life and conduct is fair play.

If we, ourselves, ever entertained such a thought, we then would be betraying the traditions that have inspired every generation of Americans and we would be faithless to the historic devotion to freedom that has made America what it is today.

We, and all our fellow Americans, realize we have had sufficient experience with Communist promises, pledges, and treaties, to know that we can trust them only at our own peril.

We remember very well the peace treaty that was signed by Lithuania and Russia at Moscow on July 12, 1920. By this treaty, the Soviet Government recognized, and I quote, "the sovereignty and independence of the State of Lithuania with all juridical consequences resulting from such recognition and voluntarily and forever renounces all sovereign rights possessed by Russia over the Lithuanian people and territory," end of quote. On September 22, 1921, Lithuania was admitted into the League of Nations, becoming a full, free, and equal member of the international community. These are historical facts which the Russian Communists cannot change because they cannot burn or distort all of the history books in existence. Although they have since unjustly seized Lithuania and have done everything within their cruel power to communize it, they cannot justify their action in front of the conscience of the world.

Every other still free nation, including our own, knows that we will suffer the same tragic fate of Lithuania if we allow ourselves to be compromised or become so foolish as to place any reliance upon mere Soviet promises. We, as good Americans, also know that if we do not stand up and testify for our friends, we may some day find ourselves alone and without friends.

That is why all our fellow Americans join with us in working for the liberation of Lithuania and all of the other unfortunate nations that have come under Communist Russian subjugation.

That is why we must unceasingly strive with our own united words and actions, and commemorations of this kind, to keep the historic spirit of liberty and freedom burning high within the minds and hearts of the people of our Lithuania homeland.

That is why we can hope, even on this sorrowful occasion, that with our help, the help of our fellow Americans, and with God's help, to live to see the bright day when the persecuted people of Lithuania, and the other suffering nations, will again be free and independent in a peaceful world.

Having assembled at Our Lady of Vilna Parish Hall, Worcester, Mass., on February 15, 1959, to commemorate the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day (February 16, 1918), the members of the committee, as well as the members of the two Lithuanian parishes in Worcester, St. Casimir's and Our Lady of Vilna, and of the Lithuanian-American community of Worcester, comprising in all 55 Lithuanian groups, unanimously adopted and passed the following resolutions:

"Whereas the Government of the United States has ever been a stanch defender of the inalienable right that all nations, both large and small, have to enjoy freedom and to determine for themselves the form of government under which they wish to live; and

"Whereas Soviet Russia has denied this right to Lithuania and, in violation of the treaties of peace and nonaggression, with Lithuania in particular, and of various international agreements in general, has unjustly seized the territory of Lithuania and has subjected her people to the horrors of oppression, terrorization, dispossession, persecution, mass deportations and mass annihilations which, according to international law, constitutes the heinous crime of genocide; and

"Whereas the Republic of Lithuania, a small freedom-loving nation, ardently desires to exercise her solemn right of self-government and has proven that she is capable of self-rule by a remarkable progress made in all fields of endeavor during the years in which she enjoyed independence (1253–1795 and particularly 1918–39); and

"Whereas, the Government of the United States since 1940 has steadfastly refused to recognize de jure the unjust absorption of Lithuania within the Soviet orbit: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Government of the United States continue to maintain and adhere to its present policy of recognizing the de jure independence of Lithuania despite her present unlawful and unprincipled occupation by Soviet Russia; be it further

"Resolved, That Soviet Russia, having no sovereign rights over Lithuania or her territory, be forced to leave Lithuania immediately, thus restoring freedom to the nation, and to return at once to Lithuania all Lithuanian nationals, now exiled in Siberia and other foreign lands; be it further

"Resolved, That the Republic of Lithuania be duly admitted and fully approved as a full-fledged member of the United Nations and that her appointed representatives be allowed to maintain with full privileges the status of duly-elected delegates of that Organization; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, His Excellency the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower; to the Secretary of State, the Honorable John Foster Dulles, Jr.; to the U.S. Representative to the United Nations, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr.; to the Senators of Massachusetts, the Honorable John F. Kennedy and the Honorable Leverett Saltonstall; to the Representative of the Fourth Congressional District of Massachusetts, the Honorable Harold D. Donohue, and to the press."

Address of Hon. Lyndon B. Johnson Before Texas State Society

OF

HON. JIM WRIGHT

OF TEXAS

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday last the senior Senator from Texas, Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON, made a memorable address at the luncheon meeting of the Texas State Society.

Honored at the luncheon were their Excellencies, the Ambassador from Spain, the Ambassador from France and the Ambassador from Mexico, and members of their families.

Senator JOHNSON'S speech was such a splendid contribution to our understanding and good relations with these countries that I am asking leave to have it printed here:

This is a pleasant occasion and, in my opinion, a significant one as well.

As a longtime member of the Texas State Society, I am most pleased to be here. And to our honored guests I would say, sincerely and from the heart: Welcome, our friends from Mexico; welcome, our friends from France; welcome, our friends from Spain.

As the official representatives in America of three great nations whose flags once floated over the land of Texas, I want you to know we are happy you are here to break bread with us and to enjoy a period of friendly companionship on this Sabbath Day.

You are gracious to have come. You are triply welcome.

In honor of this occasion, our program committee asked that I speak today on "Our Spanish, French, and Mexican Heritage."

It says something for the character of our State that such a topic should be assigned to a man named JOHNSON.

If we are some day privileged to honor our considerable debt to the British—who built our State capital and developed much of our West—an Irishman such as BOB CASEY will probably be handed the speaking assignment.

There is to me something deeply moving and deeply meaningful in the fact that you of Mexico and France and Spain should meet with us of Texas in the Capital City of the United States.

It is a long way, in time and in distance, from the Texas in which I grew up to the great city in which we find ourselves today. Texas is a State where many, many place names and many, many person names may be traced back to the heritage that came down from France and Spain and Mexico—all powers in the world of 1959.

And this city of Washington—not so very many years ago a fever-ridden village on the banks of the Potomac—has become a place where men and women cope daily with problems in the successful solution of which the free people of all the world have a vital interest.

We owe much to the heritage of our past. Yet, I cannot today speak of our heritage in the past tense. Nor can I speak of it in the sense of a one-way debt.

As Spain and France and Mexico each meant much to Texas in the past, so also did Texas mean much to the national experience of each of those nations.

The lure of Texas—the dream of the seven cities of gold on the Texas prairies—did much to stimulate in both Spain and France the force of their periods of great vigor and adventure and strength.

Texas, in centuries past, was for men of many nations a new horizon of hope and promise and opportunity. Today it is my strong conviction that we are returning on the cycle of history to such a time again.

Coronado, Cabeza de Vaca, DeSoto, LaSalle, and others who opened Texas were unaware that their explorations had scarcely penetrated the vastness of the American West—and that four centuries later we are only now coming to the time when the potential of the American West and of Mexico can be fulfilled.

The demands of our century leave us with no position but to build in the West a new capital of opportunity and strength for free men.

Our position today is comparable to that of the pioneers of our own country, who came into a wilderness brooding not upon the dangers they faced but joyously contemplating the opportunities they saw on the other side of danger.

With freedom as their guide and faith in the future as the force that impelled them constantly onward, those pioneers conquered the wilderness. They beat down the dangers. They embraced the opportunities. Time may have obsured our memory of these facts. But the facts remain unchanged.

We should build monuments to the past—but they should be monuments which recapture the values of the past and focus them upon the realities of the present.

One of these monuments could be the Big Bend National Park. When men first dreamed of this park, they thought of it as an international reservation where the people of Mexico and the United States could mingle freely—enjoying in common the rich beauties of the land.

I would hope that dream could be revived. I would hope that the park could lie on both sides of the border—as a symbol that our border is in territory only and not in friendship and good will.

It would be a potent force in advancing the Western Hemispheric community.

The hope of our hemisphere and the hope of free men everywhere is this: That we may have the wisdom to see in many lands greater promise than now meets the eye.

Spain, France, and Mexico were old before Texas was known. All had achieved greatness before our own Nation came into being. But today in those countries—and many more—there is a new surge of confidence and life and zest and determination. We, as Americans, are challenged to match it. In that thought is the special pride of this gathering today.

We from Texas realize ours is a young State and a strong State. A State now emerging into the fulfillment of a great promise.

We realize even more that these lands from whence came our origins are now once again young with us, and that the world is young together.

We are moving to a new world. Not new on the maps, but new in men's minds and lives and dreams.

We are hastening to the day when we shall together cross the plains of the future to seek, and I believe find, treasures greater than the fabled cities of gold. Our heritage is not of the past. Rather, it is a common inheritance of a common future, a future of peace, a future of freedom, a future of opportunities unlimited.

This new era—and we are already beyond the threshold—can be, will be, an era of new and higher standards, of new and greater accomplishments, of new and wider potentials.

My friends, fellow Texans, and honored guests, we are fortunate to be living at the beginning of such an age as the one now before us. Our thoughts, our decisions, our actions, can shape the destiny of men for all time to come. This is the challenge. And there is the opportunity.

I like to think of the answer that my friend and truly great American, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, gave recently when a reporter asked him what was the most interesting time he had known during his 92 years of life.

"Why," said Senator GREEN, "it's right now." Let this wise man's words speak for all of us.

To the Ambassadors who are our guests, I would say on behalf of all Texas that, next to being freemen and Americans, Texans are most proud of their traditions of character.

We thank you for the pride of the Spanish, for the love of liberty of the French, and for the courage of our great neighbor of Mexico. Without these traits, Texas could not be Texas. Texans would not be Texans.

Making the Employment Act of 1946 More Effective

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, on January 15 and 17, 1959, there were introduced in the House and Senate bills—H.R. 2561 and S. 497—to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to do two things:

First. Request the President to include in his Economic Report and annual economic program and recommendations a discussion of monetary and credit policies "to the same extent as all other policies affecting employment, production, and purchasing power."

Second. Assign to the Council of Economic Advisers in the Executive Office of the President the responsibility for holding public hearings on price or wage increases which appear to threaten economic stability and to issue advisory statements, where advisable, as to whether the proposed increases are justified.

Explanatory statements by the bills' authors, Senator CLARK, of Pennsylvania, and myself, are contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 15, 1959, pages 710 to 711, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 17, 1959, pages 789 to 790.

The filing by the President of his Economic Report on January 20, 1959, and the weeks of hearings on this report which have been held by the Joint Economic Committee, have reinforced the need for the two amendments included in H.R. 2561 and S. 497. In addition, they have disclosed the need for three additional amendments to the Employment Act of 1946 in order to provide for its more effective administration. Comprehensive new bills, which include the two earlier amendments and the three additional ones, are accordingly being introduced by the same sponsors.

The text of H.R. 4870, introduced by me, follows:

A bill to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to provide for its more effective administration and to bring to bear an informed public opinion upon price and wage increases which threaten economic stability

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Employment Act of 1946 (15 U.S.C. 1023) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 6. It is the sense of Congress that the President, and the Federal Government, in executing this Act, shall give due effect to the following provisions of the Act:

"(a) The provision of section 2 setting forth the goals of maximum employment, production (including the concept of sustained growth), and purchasing power (including the concept of reasonable price stability).

"(b) The provisions of section 3(a) requiring the President to include in each year's economic report, in quantitative terms, the levels of employment, production, and purchasing power which he deems maximum, and current and foreseeable trends.

"(c) The provision of section 3(b) for the discretionary periodic transmittal of supplementary or revised recommendations.

"(d) The provisions of section 3(a)(3) for a review, and of sections 3(a)(4) and 3(b) for program and recommendations, including therein monetary and credit policies to the same extent as all other policies affecting employment, production, and purchasing power: Provided, That if the Federal agency directly responsible for the execution of such monetary and credit policies disagrees with such program and recommendations, the President shall report such disagreement to the Congress, together with a statement from the disagreeing agency of its reasons."

SEC. 2. Section 4(c) of the Employment Act of 1946 (15 U.S.C. 1021 and the following) is amended by adding an additional subsection (c)(6) as follows:

"(6) to hold public hearings concerning (a) price increases, proposed in industries where most of the output is produced by relatively few firms, which increases appear to threaten economic stability, and (b) wage increases where the firm proposing such price increases declares such wage increases to be a cause of the price increases; to issue factual summaries of such hearings; and, where the Council deems it advisable, to issue advisory statements."

The first of the three new amendments explicitly declares that the statutory goal of the Employment Act of "maximum purchasing power"—which is a coordinate goal with maximum employment and maximum production—includes the concept of reasonable price stability. The ordinary meaning of "maximum purchasing power" would certainly seem to include "reasonable price stability." Maximum purchasing power can never be attained without reasonable price stability, since in an inflation, as we all know, incomes and hence purchasing power rise with great inequality. Moreover, the first two chairmen of the Council of Economic Advisers—1947–52—Dr. Edwin G. Nourse and Leon H. Keyserling, have both recently testified that the words "maximum purchasing power" of the act constitute an anti-inflationary mandate to bring about reasonable price stability.

The President, however, has cast doubt upon whether the Employment Act, as it is, really does contain the mandate of reasonable price stability. On January 20 the President asked the Congress "to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to make reasonable price stability an explicit goal of Federal economic policy, coordinate with the goals of maximum production, employment, and purchasing power now specified in that act." The first amendment, accordingly, explicitly adds the President's words "reasonable price stability" to the definition of the act's goals, without at the same time stigmatizing Dr. Nourse, Mr. Keyserling, and several thousand other reputable economists and public officials as wrong in thinking that reasonable price stability has been a goal of the act ever since 1946.

This amendment also explicitly states that the goal of the Employment Act of "maximum production" includes the concept of sustained growth. Economic growth is plainly comprehended by the term "maximum production," just as reasonable price stability is implied by "maximum purchasing power." However, the clarification of "maximum purchasing power" requires an equal clarification of what was intended by "maximum production."

The second of the three new amendments requires the President to include in his Economic Report the actual quantitative levels of employment, production, and purchasing power which he thinks are needed to carry out the act's goals—namely, maximum employment, production, and purchasing power. It would also require him to set forth current and foreseeable trends in the levels of employment, production, and purchasing power. Actually, the setting forth of these levels is required by the plain language of the 1946 act. The congressional mandate was faithfully adhered to by the executive branch from the first report in 1947 through 1952. In each case, a serious effort was made to project quantitative levels for employment, production, and purchasing power as they were likely to be in the upcoming year, and as they ought to be. But, since 1952, this vital portion of the Economic Report has been omitted. In the January 1959 report, for example, there is no mention whatever of quantitative levels. Obviously, unless the President is willing to project what is likely to be, and then declare what ought to be, his program for altering events so that what actually is becomes as near as possible to what ought to be, will prove inadequate.

The third of the three new amendments has to do with the requirement of section 3(b) of the 1946 act permitting the President to add to his January 20 annual report, where conditions warrant it, by making supplementary or revised recommendations. Again, the custodians in the executive branch of the Employment Act of 1946 during the period 1947–52, found it desirable each year to issue a supplementary report, usually around July. Since then, the Council of Economic Advisers is heard from on January 20, but is then heard from no more. Certainly, if there are major changes in the economic situation at any time during the year, Congress wants to be informed of them. Accordingly, the existence of the power to make supplementary recommendations needs to be made clear.

Murray-Metcalf Bill Strengthens Local and State Control Over Education

OF
HON. LEE METCALF
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 16, 1959

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, February 4, 1959, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] introduced into the House of Representatives a bill to provide money for educational purposes termed free from any Federal controls. The gentleman from Washington stated:

> Therefore, I am introducing a no-strings-attached alternative bill to pay back some of their own money to the respective States and Hawaii for educational purposes free from any Federal controls. My bill would authorize an appropriation equal to 2 percent of all Federal income taxes collected in each State and Hawaii for education in the common or public schools. That is all. No standards or specifications of any sort are stipulated.

In introducing his bill, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] clearly recognizes that there is need for the Federal Government to take action in assisting local and State authorities in the financial support of schools. He said:

> If some of our local school districts' financial affairs are critical, and I am convinced such is the case, let us give the local and State authorities help but refrain from dictating how they must solve their problems.

By some twist of the imagination the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] asserted in his speech that the Murray-Metcalf bill—H.R. 22—sets forth limitations and definitions of the State educational program that would make it unnecessary for State and local education agencies "to abdicate jurisdiction over educational process." Such a contention is incorrect. There is nothing in the Murray-Metcalf bill that would require even in the slightest any abdication of State and local jurisdiction over the educational process. On the contrary, the Murray-Metcalf bill was drawn up in such a way as to specifically strengthen the local and State control over education in this Nation.

In an attempt to document his contention that the Murray-Metcalf bill sets forth limitations on the States' education programs, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] cited section 4, subsection (b), of the bill, which he says "spells out specifically that this money shall be used for school construction and teachers' salaries." It is impossible to see how anyone could consider that the Congress, through providing money to the States to be used for either school construction or teachers' salaries, could be accused of setting forth limitations on the States' education programs. Such a contention is somewhat analogous to the story of the father of a 12-year-old newspaper boy who was earning some of his own spending money. The father gave the boy $20 to buy shoes and clothing that the boy needed badly. It would be absurd to argue that in giving the boy money to be used for these two purposes, the father was limiting his son's discretion over how he would spend his earnings from his paper route.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] stated that section 5 of the Murray-Metcalf bill, "by inference sets forth priorities for school buildings, removing from the State the latitude of determining its own needs." Actually, all section 5 of the bill does is say that the State education agency shall certify that the portion of its Murray-Metcalf funds that are allocated within the State for school construction shall be so distributed that "priority is given to school districts which have the greatest additional need for school facilities and which, in terms of the economic resources available to them are least able to finance the cost of needed school facilities." This provision of the bill leaves the priorities that are to be developed wholly up to the State. The U.S. Commissioner of Education does not have the authority to say whether or not the priorities that the States set up are adequate or inadequate; he has neither the power to approve or to disapprove the States' priority methods. Hence, the gentleman's contention that these priorities would remove from the States the latitude of determining their own needs is completely false. Again, this is somewhat analogous to the case of the father of the 12-year-old newspaper boy giving his son the $20 bill with which to buy needed clothing and saying:

> Son, first sit down and draw up a list of the clothes you need and with this money buy the items you need most.

Such a specification by the father certainly could not be considered as removing from the son the latitude of determining his own clothing needs.

All the Murray-Metcalf bill does in section 5 is to say to the States that if they use for school construction some of the money provided under this bill, they must agree to send the money to those school districts that need it the most. Certainly such a specification could not be considered as causing the States "to abdicate local and State jurisdiction over educational process."

In his speech, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] stated:

> If some of our local school districts' financial affairs are critical, and I am convinced such is the case, let us give the local and State authorities help.

Let us look for a moment at the type of help that the gentleman would give State and local school districts under his proposed return of 2 percent of all the Federal income taxes collected in each State to be used for "education in the common or public schools." The Pelly bill introduced would provide $71 per child of school age in New York but in his own State of Washington it would provide only $25 per child of school age, while in the State of Mississippi it would provide only $4. These figures are obtained by dividing the States' 2 percent of 1957 Federal income tax payments, given by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. PELLY] in his speech, by the estimated school age population, 5–17 years, for 1957. It is most difficult to see how the Pelly bill would provide help to those school districts that have the most critical need for such support from the Federal Government. Actually, the gentleman's proposal would provide for equalization in reverse, for it would give proportionately the greatest amount of money to the States that had proportionately the least number of school age children. On the other hand, the Murray-Metcalf bill would collect the money from the States in which the wealth is located and distribute it to the States in which the children actually reside and are to be educated. Hence, there is a substantial equalizing effect in the collection and distribution of funds under the Murray-Metcalf bill.

Moreover, there would be hardly any more administrative costs involved in the Murray-Metcalf bill than there would be in Mr. PELLY's proposal. After all, it is the same revenue agency that would be collecting the taxes and the same Treasury Department that would be sending a check to each State. The only additional cost involved in the Murray-Metcalf bill would be a fraction of one person's time needed to determine the amount to be paid to each State under the formula provided in the bill and to receive reports from the States. These administrative costs should amount to not over $10,000. Such an amount is infinitesimal in comparison with the $4.7 billion that the Murray-Metcalf bill would annually make available to the States for the vital needs of school construction and teachers' salaries.

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1959

Dr. E. Hermond Westmoreland, pastor, South Main Baptist Church, Houston, Tex., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and eternal God, in whose hands are the issues of men and of nations, we bow in humble reverence before Thee, and with grateful hearts acknowledge Thy manifold blessings to us as a people. Through all the changed and changing circumstances of life, Thou hast made and preserved us a Nation. We thank Thee for Thy favor shown unto our fathers and for Thy faithfulness continued unto their children.

Teach us to be worthy of freedom. Break down the barriers that divide us. Unite our hearts in the pursuit of righteousness and truth.

Endue with the spirit of wisdom those to whom, in Thy name, we entrust the authority of Government. Grant that neither through arrogance nor pride we forget our dependence upon Thee and our responsibility to Thee.

Guide our Nation into great adventures for the well-being of mankind and the establishment of peace in the world.

We humbly offer our prayer in Jesus' name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 16, 1959, was dispensed with.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of other routine business. I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was authorized to meet today during the session of the Senate.

PRAYER BY DR. E. HERMOND WESTMORELAND

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the inspirational prayer which we have heard this day was brought by a man who has served as pastor to the same congregation, the South Main Baptist Church, in Houston, Tex., for the last 21 years.

As a leader of his church, Dr. Westmoreland served as president of the Baptist General Convention in Texas; and he now is in Washington, attending a committee meeting of the Baptist World Alliance.

All of us are inspired by having him in our presence.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to address the Senate at this time, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION SALES POLICIES, ACTIVITIES, AND DISPOSITIONS

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"ENROLLED JOINT MEMORIAL 2

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America with reference to the proceeds derived from the mineral leasing of Federal Government lands within the borders of the State of Wyoming

"Whereas over 51 percent of the surface and 73 percent of the minerals in the State of Wyoming are controlled by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the surface and minerals constitute an important part of the life and economy of the State of Wyoming; and

"Whereas most of the revenue derived from the leasing of the surface and minerals is now retained and controlled by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the welfare and interest of the citizens of the State of Wyoming demand a more equitable share of the revenue derived from the leasing of the minerals under Federal ownership within the State of Wyoming; and

"Whereas the revenue so derived should be used for the support of schools or other public educational institutions and for the construction and maintenance of public roads within the State of Wyoming: Now, therefore be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the 35th Legislature of the State of Wyoming, the House of Representatives of such Legislature concurring, That the President and Congress of the United States of America, be and they are hereby memorialized to fairly and diligently consider the welfare and interest of the people of the State of Wyoming who favor legislation providing that 90 percent of all moneys received from the sale of or as bonuses, royalties, or rentals on federally controlled minerals within the State of Wyoming be paid by the Treasurer of the United States to the State of Wyoming to be used for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions in such manner as the Legislature of the State of Wyoming may direct; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies hereof be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of said Congress, U.S. Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, U.S. Senator GALE MCGEE, and Representative in Congress E. KEITH THOMSON, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Director of the Bureau of Land Management.

"NORMAN BARLOW,
"President of the Senate.
"JAY R. HOUSE,
"Speaker of the House."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"ENROLLED JOINT MEMORIAL 3

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America with reference to passing legislation relating to issuance of birth certificates for foreign children adopted by American citizens and to liberalize the naturalization requirements for such children

"Whereas adoption of foreign childen is now an integral part of adoption practices in this country; and

"Whereas the Refugee Relief Act of 1953 provided for nonquota visas to be issued to 4,000 foreign orphans; and

"Whereas approximately 10,000 foreign children were adopted into American families from 1954 to 1958; and

"Whereas under Federal statutes foreign children adopted by American citizens do not automatically become U.S. citizens by the fact of such adoption, but naturalization remains necessary; and

"Whereas in many cases the original birth record of a foreign child cannot be procured from his country of origin, and in many other cases neither the foreign child's country of origin nor even his true name is known nor can be ascertained; and

"Whereas a State cannot lawfully issue a birth certificate for a foreign child adopted by U.S. citizens because by entering the names of the adoptive parents as parents, even though the true place of birth be also set forth, the user of the record could conclude that the child is a U.S. citizen for the reason that its parents are U.S. citizens; and

"Whereas foreign children adopted by U.S. citizens should be entitled to secure birth certificates and should further have their citizenship status clarified and assured: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the 35th Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the House of such legislature concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be and it is hereby memorialized to promptly, diligently and fairly consider and act upon at this session, legislation designed to authorize the States to issue birth certificates to foreign children adopted by U.S. citizens and to clarify and assure the citizenship status of such children by providing: (1) that foreign children under 6 years of age who are adopted by U.S. citizens shall automatically become citizens upon completion of the adoption in an American court of competent jurisdiction; and, (2) that an application for naturalization shall be required to accompany the petition for adoption of foreign children over the age of 6 years, and that a birth certificate shall be issued for such children upon proof of the completion of such naturalization; and be it further

"Resolved, That such legislation shall include any security measures for the protection of our country which shall be deemed appropriate by the Congress of the United States of America and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies hereof be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of said Congress, U.S. Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, U.S. Senator GALE MCGEE, and Representative in Congress E. KEITH THOMSON, to the Chief, Children's Bureau, U.S. Public Health Service, to the Chief, National Office of Vital Statistics, U.S. Public Health Service, and to the Council of State Governments.

"NORMAN BARLOW,
"President of the Senate.
"JAY R. HOUSE,
"Speaker of the House."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on Public Works:

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 2

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and His Excellency the President of the United States to take action regarding the replacement of facilities lost to the people of South Dakota through flooding of Missouri River lowlands

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein)—

"Whereas the established Federal policies as set forth by the Congress of the United States require the replacement of public facilities lost through the development of Federal projects; and

"Whereas the Missouri River development in South Dakota has taken or will take all of the timber and wild life cover that formerly existed along the Missouri River; and

"Whereas this deprives wild life of cover and the people of this area from picnic and recreational areas which have not been replaced; and

"Whereas many points of historical interest are flooded and lost which cannot be replaced; and

"Whereas the promises of the United States Corps of Engineers were that such development would increase recreational and related opportunities; and

"Whereas the Federal program to date on reforestation and development of recreational facilities and approach roads has been totally inadequate; and

"Whereas any such replacement is beyond the capacity of the State of South Dakota: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of the 36th session of South Dakota Legislature, the House of Representatives concurring, do memorialize the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Army, to take prompt steps to establish pumping stations to provide a water level in public lakes near the Missouri River basin as a replacement for resting places for ducks and geese; and to provide for reforestation projects at and near the headwaters of the tributaries to the Missouri River system including the establishment of small stationary level bodies of water so that trees may flourish and provide some replacement for the loss of cover for wild life because of the flooding of the Missouri River lowlands and to in other ways develop the recreational possibilities as promised, and to provide access thereto; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Army of the United States, to U.S. Senator KARL K. MUNDT, to U.S. Senator FRANCIS CASE, to Congressman E. Y. BERRY, to Congressman GEORGE S. MCGOVERN, and to the Presiding Officers of both Houses of Congress.

"JOHN F. LIDLEY,
"Lieutenant Governor.
"W. K. HOLLAND,
"Secretary of the Senate.
"ARCHIE GUBBRUD,
"Speaker of the House.
"W. J. MATSON,
"Chief Clerk."

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Washington; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"Whereas the U.S. Army currently proposes to move the Fort Lewis Personnel Center to San Francisco, Calif., despite previous assurances given by the Army after the closure of the Seattle Army Terminal that the movement of military troops and cargo through Seattle would not be affected; and

"Whereas, if carried out, this latest move would wipe out the Military Sea Transport Service (North Pacific), would adversely affect the United States Army terminal agency, would jeopardize the jobs of some 1,500 employees of other Federal agencies in the Seattle area, and would deal another crippling blow to the Seattle port; and

"Whereas the Army's excuses are specious, as demonstrated by the fact that, with the superior pier facilities at piers 90 and 91 in Seattle, a ship can load troops, cargo, and provisions at one location while in San Francisco ships must move to three locations to accomplish this at an additional cost of $6,000 to $8,000 for each ship, and by the fact that the per ton costs of handling cargo are $5.30 in Seattle and $8 in San Francisco, and by the fact that Seattle is 2 days closer to the Orient and our new State of Alaska than is San Francisco, and every day that a ship is at sea costs from $6,600 to $6,800 for its operation; and

"Whereas we ought, by now, to have learned from the lesson of Pearl Harbor that the concentration of military facilities in the name of economy can be a costly if not fatal error; and

"Whereas, if the San Francisco harbor were put out of commission by an enemy, there would be no other harbors able to handle large cargo vessels within hundreds of miles of that city, while near Seattle there are Tacoma, Portland, Vancouver, Wash., and Vancouver, British Columbia, with adequate port facilities for the large vessels; and

"Whereas this continued economic bleeding of the port of Seattle may well destroy its ability to respond to the burden which would be placed upon it in a defense emergency; and

"Whereas the 48 older States owe it to their newest sister State of Alaska to make men and material for its defense in case of attack available as rapidly as possible by maintaining the strength of the port which is closest to Alaska: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the House of Representatives of the State of Washington, most respectfully implore the President of the United States, the U.S. Senate, the U.S. House of Representatives, and the Secretary of Defense to put a stop to this costly, dangerous, and unwise concentration of the military shipping from the California ports and to order and direct that a fair share of such military sea traffic pass through the port of Seattle to insure Seattle's status as a major port to guarantee its immediate availability in case of an emergency and to protect the economy of this vital Northwest sector of the Nation; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the U.S. Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Secretary of Defense of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Washington.

"S. R. HOLCOMB,
"Chief Clerk, House of Representatives."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Utah; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 1

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress and the President of the United States to safeguard and preserve established State and individual rights to the use of water within the separate States

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah (the Governor concurring therein)—

"Whereas recent decisions from the Federal courts and recent rulings from the U.S. Department of Justice have deprived States, and persons, of rights which said States and persons previously enjoyed, to regulate and control the use of the water in those respective States; and

"Whereas said decisions and rulings are further a part of a general pattern developing gradually into Federal supremacy and usurpation over water, which, if continued will destroy individual and States rights over water, and substitute in lieu thereof an all powerful centralized Government control thereover: Be it therefore

"Resolved by the 33d Legislature of the State of Utah, the Governor concurring therein, That the Congress and President of the United States and the Representatives of Utah in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby urged and requested to take all necessary action to (1) preserve the water rights of the individuals and the States and to prevent Federal usurpation of those rights; (2) to see that legislation is initiated and supported to reestablish to the individuals and to the States, the rights taken from them by the Federal courts and the Justice Department; and (3) in every way possible reaffirm, renew, and defend the concepts that water rights are property rights and that these established rights, to the use of water, by a State or an individual, should not be taken away without due process of law and adequate compensation; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of the above be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress, chairman of the U.S. Senate and House Committee of Interior and Insular Affairs, U.S. Senator WALLACE F. BENNETT, U.S. Senator FRANK E. MOSS, U.S. Representative HENRY A. DIXON, and U.S. Representative DAVID S. KING."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Armed Services:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 2

"Joint resolution by the Senate of the 36th Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, House of Representatives concurring, to the Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States; to the Honorable Neil McElroy, Secretary of Defense; to the President of the Senate of the United States; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; to the Honorable James E. Murray, Senator from Montana; to the Honorable Mike Mansfield, Senator from Montana; to the Honorable Lee Metcalf, Congressman from Montana; to the Honorable Leroy Anderson, Congressman from Montana; to the Honorable Richard B. Russell, Senator from Georgia and chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee; and to the Honorable Carl Vinson, Congressman from Georgia and chairman of the House of Representatives Armed Services Committee, urging that the President and the Congress assure the people of the State of Montana that the National Guard of the United States, as recognized and established in the Constitution and laws of the United States, will be preserved; and that no unilateral Federal action concerning the National Guard of the United States reducing in strength or units will be taken without prior consultation and approval of the States acting by and through the Governor thereof

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States of America provides the individual citizen with several inalienable rights and that Constitution with its inalienable rights for the individual is being threatened by the Communist nations of the world wherein the rights of the State and not the rights of the individual are supreme; and

"Whereas the dual role of the National Guard, as recognized and established in the Constitution and laws of the United States, requires that it effectively serve the needs of the States in time of peace as well as those of the Nation in time of war; and

"Whereas the realities of modern defense requirements dictate that the National Guard be established on a basis which will enable it to adequately serve the States as an immediately available defense and retaliatory force, in the interval prior to effective national mobilization, in the event of a surprise attack; and

"Whereas the proposed plan to reorganize the Department of Defense grants to the Secretary of Defense vastly increased powers which could be used to eliminate or greatly reduce the National Guard of the United States; and,

"Whereas the Department of Defense did develop and announce without prior consultation and approval of the Governors of the several States and Territories a plan to greatly reduce the National Guard of the United States; and

"Whereas the Governors of the several States are opposed to such unilateral Federal action concerning the National Guard, both Army and Air, and did oppose a reduction in strength or units of the National Guard in a resolution adopted by the U.S. Conference of Governors, May 21, 1958; and

"Whereas the Honorable J. Hugo Aronson, Governor of the State of Montana as representative of the several Western States' Governors did personally appear before the United States House of Representatives Armed Services Committee and oppose any reduction in strength or units of the National Guard: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the 36th Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, That the people of the State of Montana are opposed to unilateral Federal action concerning the National Guard of the United States, both Army and Air, and oppose any reduction in strength or units without prior consultation and approval of the States acting by and through the Governor thereof; be it further

"Resolved, That the clerk of the Senate of the 36th Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States; to the Secretary of Defense; to the President of the Senate of the United States; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; to the Honorable JAMES E. MURRAY, Senator from Montana; to the Honorable MIKE MANSFIELD, Senator from Montana; to the Honorable LEE METCALF, Congressman from Montana; to the Honorable LEROY ANDERSON, Congressman from Montana; to the Honorable RICHARD B. RUSSELL, Senator from Georgia and chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee; and to the Honorable CARL VINSON, Congressman from Georgia and chairman of the House of Representatives Armed Services Committee.

A resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Minneapolis, Minn., relating to provision of adequate funds for airport improvements; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The petition of David H. Johnson, of the State of Utah, praying for a redress of grievances; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LANGER (for himself and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota):

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION A

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Secretary of Agriculture to utilize available funds for purchase of poultry, beef, and pork products in school lunch program

"Whereas the U.S. Department of Agriculture has been authorized to expend the sum of $35 million in accordance with the provisions of section 32 of Public Law 320 of the 74th Congress for the purchase of foods as authorized in section 6 of the National School Lunch Act; and

"Whereas the department has seen fit to withhold the spending of $15 million of such funds; and

"Whereas it is the opinion of the North Dakota Legislative Assembly that the school lunch program is lacking in high protein foods. Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the aforesaid $15 million be put to use immediately to purchase high protein foods such as stewing hens, eggs, and other poultry products, since such products are not under any price support program, and when market conditions are such that beef and pork may be purchased, that these meats also be regularly purchased; and be it further

"Resolved, That Congress increase appropriations for the national school lunch program in order that this program may provide an adequate noonday meal for every schoolchild; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state, to the Secretary of Agriculture, and each member of the North Dakota congressional delegation.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Public Works:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

"Concurrent resolution favoring the early construction of the proposed Bowman Haley Dam and Reservoir project and urging the Corps of Engineers to expedite the completion of a favorable report thereon

"Whereas recurring floods on the North Fork of the Grand River in North Dakota, have caused heavy damage to agricultural lands and improvements thereon, and to livestock during the past 50 years; and

"Whereas such floodwaters are vitally needed for beneficial purposes in the affected areas and should be stored and conserved for orderly use as and when needed; and

"Whereas the lignite resources of the basin, the uraniferous lignite resources and other mineral and agricultural resources of the North Fork, Grand River Basin, and concurrent and potential industrial interest in developing such resources indicates potential population growth in the basin; and

"Whereas population studies made by the North Dakota State Water Conservation Commission and Omaha District, Corps of Engineers, indicate that with favorable conditions the population of the communities of Bowman, Scranton, Gascoyne, and Reeder, N. Dak., could increase from 2,675 persons in 1956 to 15,400 in 2012; and

"Whereas the indicated population growth is concurred in locally as being reasonable and conservative in view of the industrial potential of the basin; and

"Whereas municipal and industrial water requirements of the communities of Bowman, Scranton, Gascoyne, and Reeder are expected to increase progressively from a 1956 usage level of approximately 250 acre-feet annually to 2,600 acre-feet annually by the year 2012 on the basis of population projections and per capita usage of 150 gallons per day; and

"Whereas the ground water resources of the basin are subject to overdraft at present rates of withdrawal; and

"Whereas geologic opinion indicates that complete development of the ground water resources will not provide an assured water supply of the quantity required for future municipal and industrial growth: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That the 36th Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota favors the early construction of the Bowman Haley Dam and Reservoir project for flood control, domestic, municipal, industrial, and agricultural water supplies, power, recreation, fish and wildlife, and other uses, and urges the Corps of Engineers to expedite the development and completion of a favorable benefit-cost report thereon to the end that congressional approval thereof may be sought in the next flood-control bill; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies hereof be mailed by the secretary of state to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the committees on public works, the Chief of Engineers, the Omaha district engineer, and to Senators WILLIAM LANGER and MILTON R. YOUNG, and Representatives QUENTIN BURDICK and DON L. SHORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Public Works.

STATEHOOD FOR HAWAII—JOINT RESOLUTION OF MONTANA LEGISLATURE—NOTICE OF HEARINGS

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, Montana is officially designated the "Treasure State." This is an accurate description. But Montana also is truly a pioneer State. Pioneers historically believe in freedom and equality. Therefore, it is significant that the first resolution enacted by the Legislature of the State of Montana in its current session calls for freedom and equality for the more than one-half million American citizens of the American Territory of Hawaii by granting to them statehood.

Hearings on the bill for Hawaii statehood, S. 50, which has 55 sponsors, will start in the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee on February 25. In connection with these hearings, I ask that the text of House Joint Resolution No. 1, enacted by the 36th session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana on February 6, appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 1

Joint resolution of the House and Senate of the State of Montana requesting the President and Congress of the United States to do what may be necessary to give full statehood to the Territory of Hawaii

Whereas the Legislature of Montana is aware of the unfairness with which the Territory of Hawaii has been treated in its appeal for statehood; and

Whereas the Legislature of Montana is aware of the great contributions that the Territory of Hawaii has made to the welfare of the United States, and believing that such contributions could be vastly accelerated by statehood; and

Whereas the platforms of both major political parties have and do advocate statehood for Hawaii; and

Whereas the President of the United States has advocated statehood for Hawaii in speeches, and before his inauguration; and

Whereas the growth and prosperity of the Territory of Hawaii, and the people of Hawaii are seriously handicapped by the Territorial status that now exists; and

Whereas the Territory of Hawaii, and the people of that Territory have now reached a stalemate in their development that cannot be overcome until statehood is granted; and

Whereas it is to the future benefit of the United States of America to accelerate the development of the vast potential that is Hawaii: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Montana, both house and senate concurring, do petition the President and the Congress of the United States to jointly do that which is necessary to immediately give full statehood to the Territory of Hawaii; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be submitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to each of the individuals and to the chairman of the committee named in the title of this resolution, and also to the presiding officers of both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

JOHN J. MACDONALD,
Speaker of the House.
PAUL CANNON,
President of the Senate.

By Mr. COTTON (for himself and Mr. BRIDGES):

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of New Hampshire; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"Whereas the U.S. State Department has been primarily responsible for the United States entering into a pact with the U.S.S.R., providing for cultural exchanges, including the exchange of commercial motion pictures between the two countries to be shown in commercial theaters; and

"Whereas the Soviet films may contain clever, subtle Red Russian propaganda: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the members of the House of Representatives of the New Hampshire General Court, go on record as denouncing the showing of any Soviet film which contains propaganda either directly or hidden; and be it further

"Resolved, That we respectfully request the screening or selection board set up by said pact to take cognizance of the possibility of such propaganda and refuse to accept any film which may contain such propaganda; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to our Representatives in the Congress of the United States."

RESOLUTIONS OF ARMY AND AIR NATIONAL GUARD AND NAVAL MILITIA ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK STATE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, a series of resolutions adopted by the Army and Air National Guard and Naval Militia Association of the State of New York, at its annual conference in Albany. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION RELATING TO A STUDY BY AN APPROPRIATE COMMITTEE OF CONGRESS OF THE SUBJECT OF MEDICAL CARE, HOSPITALIZATION, DISABILITY RETIREMENT, AND DEATH BENEFITS FOR MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVE COMPONENTS

Whereas under existing Federal law there are many cases of hardship and inequity in regard to the administration and award of medical care, hospitalization, disability retirement and death benefits for members of the National Guard and reserve components; and

Whereas a study by an appropriate committee of Congress of this problem and the correction of inequities is necessary and desirable and in the public interest; and

Whereas studies of other matters of comparable import and complexity have previously been undertaken by committees of the Congress of the United States, with the resulting enactment of appropriate remedial legislation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Army and Air National Guard and Naval Militia Association of the State of New York in general conference assembled at Albany, N.Y., this 13th day of September 1958, That the officers of this association request the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the 86th Congress to refer to a standing committee of the House or to a special committee, as may be deemed appropriate, for study, report and proposal of remedial legislation, the subject of medical care, hospitalization, disability retirement, and death benefits for members of the National Guard and reserve components and their dependents; and be it further

Resolved, That the officers of this association transmit copies of this resolution to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretaries of Defense and of the military departments, the Members of Congress from New York, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau and the president of the National Guard Association of the United States.

A RESOLUTION CONCERNING SENATE BILL 3240 OF THE 85TH CONGRESS TO AMEND THE RESERVE OFFICERS' PERSONNEL ACT OF 1954

Whereas there are several provisions of the Reserve Officers' Personnel Act of 1954 that are seriously affecting the morale, growth, and potential combat capability of Air National Guard, and that these same adversary restrictive provisions will materially affect the Army National Guard in 1960; and

Whereas it has been indicated that proposed Department of Defense legislation, the ROPA omnibus bill, will not be submitted to the 86th Congress in sufficient time to provide the immediate relief desired; and

Whereas Senate Bill 3240 of the 85th Congress would have provided some desirable relief by and of the Reserve Officers' Personnel Act of 1954 by providing for the following:

1. United States property and fiscal officers would be retained until the age of 60.
2. Removal of the pusher clause.

3. Removal of the phrase on vacancy promotions of Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve units and mobilization designator positions.

4. Retention in units of all officers for 14 years or to the grade of major, whichever is sooner.

5. Retention in units of professional type; that is, medical department, judge advocate, chaplains, etc., for 21 years or to the grade of lieutenant colonel, whichever is sooner.

6. Retention of Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve technicians to age 60.

7. Removal of the phrase on appointment of Reserve officers to fill mobilization requirements or active duty positions; and

Whereas Senate Bill 3240 of the 85th Congress, which contained the foregoing provisions, was not passed by the 85th Congress, but will be introduced in the 86th Congress convening in January of 1959: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this association recommend and support the introduction and passage of a bill substantially the same as Senate Bill 3240 of the 85th Congress in order to secure early approval of this legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That the officers of this association transmit copies of this resolution to the chairmen of the Armed Services Committees of the Congress, the Secretaries of Defense and of the Department of the Army and of the Department of the Air Force, the Members of Congress from New York, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau and the president of the National Guard Association of the United States.

RESOLUTION RELATING TO THE EXTENSION OF FEDERAL LAWS CONCERNING THE PROCUREMENT OF PERSONNEL FOR THE ACTIVE FORCES AND THE RESERVE COMPONENTS, AND RELATING TO THE ELIMINATION OF INEQUITIES IN SUCH LAWS AND IMPLEMENTING REGULATIONS

Whereas the authority to draft persons for 2 years of active Federal service under the Universal Military Training and Service Act will terminate on July 1, 1959; and

Whereas other legal provisions which authorize 6 months' active duty for training for members of the National Guard and Federal Reserves will terminate on August 1, 1959; and

Whereas the requirements of national defense dictate that these laws should be extended; and

Whereas under existing laws and implementing regulations, a Ready Reserve participating obligation is imposed upon those who have already performed 2 years of active service in the Armed Forces of the United States, while many young men do not perform any military duty, and, therefore, the burden of military service is unfairly distributed and is generally inequitable; and

Whereas such laws and regulations should be revised to eliminate these inequities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Army and Air National Guard and Naval Militia Association of the State of New York in conference assembled at Albany, N.Y., on the 13th day of September 1958, That—

1. The authority to draft persons between 18½ and 26 years of age for 2 years of active duty should be extended for a further period of 4 years; i.e., until July 1, 1963.

2. The obligation of prior service personnel to serve in Ready Reserve units after completing their period of active duty be eliminated, but that they continue to have a Standby Reserve obligation under which they would be subject to call in case of war or national emergency.

3. Authority be extended until July 1, 1963, for persons to enlist voluntarily in the National Guard or Federal Reserves, such persons to be required to perform not less than 3 months' or more than 6 months' active duty for training; and that such authority be amended to apply to all persons between the ages of 17 and 26.

a. Persons under age 18½ enlisting in a unit of the National Guard or Federal Reserves under the above authority shall be required to participate as a member of such unit for a period which shall not be less than 3 years following completion of their active duty for training.

b. Persons between the ages of 18½ and 26 years enlisting in a unit of the National Guard or Federal Reserves under the above authority shall be required to participate as a member of such unit for a total of 6 years including their active duty for training.

4. The Universal Military Training and Service Act be amended to provide for the early release of persons inducted for 2 years of active Federal service who have completed a minimum of 6 months of active service, if such persons volunteer to enlist and serve in a unit of the National Guard or Federal Reserve for a total period of 6 years including their period of active service.

5. Copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretaries of Defense and of the military departments, the chairman of the Armed Services Committees of Congress and of the Military Affairs Committees of the Legislature, the Members of Congress from New York, the Governor of New York, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau and the president of the National Guard Association of the United States.

Whereas thousands of ROTC graduates, after being commissioned in the Army Reserve and after completion of either 2 years of active duty or 6 months' active duty for training, are returned to inactive status, without assignment to reserve units, as provided for in section VI (D.I.) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act as amended, due to lack of sufficient vacancies within Reserve units; and

Whereas this results in a great waste of training officer manpower; and

Whereas there should be a flow of these officers coming into the National Guard, and the law should be amended to make this possible: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Army and Air National Guard and Naval Militia Association of the State of New York in general conference assembled at Albany, N.Y., this 13th day of September, 1958, That section VI (D.I.) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act, as amended, be further amended to provide that appropriate Reserve units, within the meaning of such section, shall include the Army National Guard of a State, Territory, or District of Columbia, the governor or other executive authority of which has requested and approved the assignment of such Reserve officers; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretaries of Defense and Army, the Governor of the State of New York, the Members of the Congress from New York, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau, and the president of the National Guard Association of the United States.

RELATING TO THE STRENGTH AND 6 MONTHS' TRAINING QUOTAS OF THE ARMY NATIONAL GUARD OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE NEW YORK ARMY NATIONAL GUARD

Whereas the Department of Defense Appropriations Act for the fiscal year 1959 (Public Law 85-724) provides that the Army National Guard of the United States shall be maintained at 400,000 strength during the fiscal year 1959, and such act appropriates funds to carry out such purpose; and

Whereas pursuant to such act, funds should be allocated by the military departments and the Bureau of the Budget to maintain the paid drill strength of the Army National Guard of the United States at 400,000, including not less than 55,000 6 months' trainees; and

Whereas under the existing international situation, and the present military commitments of the United States throughout the world, the strength, of the Army National Guard of the United States, as an essential part of the landpower of the United States, should be stabilized at not less than 400,000; and

Whereas the New York Army National Guard should be maintained and stabilized at not less than 27,000 strength, including not less than 6,000 6 months' trainees: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Army and Air National Guard and Naval Militia Association of the State of New York in general conference assembled at Albany, N.Y., this 13th day of September 1958, That—

1. The paid drill strength of the Army National Guard of the United States be maintained at 400,000, including not less than 55,000 6 months' trainees during the fiscal year 1959 and that the Departments of Defense and/or Army immediately issue a public announcement to the effect that the appropriations voted by Congress for this purpose will be allocated and used accordingly.

2. The paid drill strength of the Army National Guard of the United States be stabilized in the future at not less than the strength and annual number of trainees set forth above, i.e., 400,000 strength, including not less than 55,000 6 months' trainees.

3. Based on a total strength of 400,000 for the Army National Guard of the United States, the New York Army National Guard be maintained at not less than 27,000, including not less than 6,000 6 months' trainees.

4. The Federal departments concerned take such action as may be necessary to insure accomplishment of the above objectives.

5. Copies of this resolution be sent by the officers of this association to the President of the United States, the Secretaries of Defense and Army, the chairman of the Armed Services Committees of Congress, the Governor of the State of New York, the Members of Congress from New York, the Chief of the National Guard Bureau, and the president of the National Guard Association of the United States.

RESOLUTIONS — STANDING COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Mr. SCHOEPPEL (for himself, Mr. BRIDGES, and Mr. GOLDWATER) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 80), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, that rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate (relating to standing committees) is amended by—

(1) striking out parts 10 through 13 in subparagraph (h) of paragraph (1);

(2) striking out parts 16 through 19 in subparagraph (1) of paragraph (1); and

(3) inserting in paragraph (1) after subpararaph (p) the following new subparagraph:

"(q) Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of 13 Senators, 5 who are also members of the Committee on Finance, 4 who are also members of the Committee on Armed Services, and 4 who are also members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. All proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects shall be referred to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

"1. Veterans' measures, generally.

"2. Pensions of all wars of the United States, general and special.

"3. Life insurance issued by the Government on account of service in the Armed Forces.

"4. Compensation of veterans.

"5. Vocational rehabilitation and education of veterans.

"6. Veterans' hospitals, medical care, and treatment of veterans.

"7. Soldiers' and sailors' civil relief.

"8. Readjustment of servicemen to civil life."

SEC. 2. Paragraph 4 of Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by striking out "and Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences" and inserting in lieu thereof "Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences, and Committee on Veterans' Affairs".

SEC. 3. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall as promptly as feasible after its appointment and organization confer with the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for the purpose of determining what disposition should be made of proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters theretofore referred to the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare during the 86th Congress which are within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF RULES XVI AND XXV, RELATING TO APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. THURMOND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 81), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended (1) by striking out the heading thereto and inserting in lieu thereof "Amendments to Appropriation Bills and Amendments Creating a Charge on the Treasury," and (2) by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"8. No amendment to a bill or joint resolution shall be received or considered if it authorizes (A) expenditures from debt receipts, or the creation of obligations by contract in advance of appropriations, and (B) is not moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate."

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Committee on Appropriations, to consist of 27 Senators, to which committee shall be referred—

"(1) All proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government; and

"(2) All proposed legislation (other than legislation within the purview of paragraph (1) above, or relating to claims against the United States) authorizing expenditures from debt receipts, or the creation of obligations by contract in advance of appropriations; except that any proposed legislation carrying such authority which relates to a substantive matter within the jurisdiction of any other standing committee of the Senate shall be referred first to such committee."

PUBLIC DEFENDERS TO REPRESENT INDIGENT DEFENDANTS IN CRIMINAL COURT CASES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill which I am introducing today on behalf of myself, and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEATING in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1079) to provide for the representation of indigent defendants in criminal cases in the district courts of the United States, introduced by Mr. JAVITS for himself and Mr. KEFAUVER, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JAVITS. The bill proposed legislation to establish a nationwide system of public defenders to represent indigent defendants in criminal court cases.

Our bill also provides that grants may be made to legal aid societies, bar associations, and similar groups rendering free legal service to defendants in U.S. district courts who cannot afford to hire counsel.

Similar legislation sponsored by myself and Senators KEFAUVER and WILEY passed the Senate last year but no action was taken on it by the House of Representatives. Its purpose has been endorsed by the Department of Justice, the Judicial Conference of the United States, the American Bar Association, the National Legal Aid and Defender Association and other leading bar associations throughout the country.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks the resolution of the National Legal Aid and Defender Association, adopted on August 20, 1958.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION CONCERNING FEDERAL PUBLIC DEFENDER LEGISLATION, ADOPTED BY THE ASSEMBLY OF DELEGATES OF THE NATIONAL LEGAL AID AND DEFENDER ASSOCIATION AT ITS 36TH ANNUAL CONFERENCE HELD AT PASADENA, CALIF., AUGUST 20 TO 22, 1958

Whereas the National Legal Aid and Defender Association in the past has consistently favored public defender legislation for the courts of the United States; and

Whereas such legislation has again been introduced in the Congress of the United States: Now, therefore, it is hereby

Resolved, That the National Legal Aid and Defender Association reaffirms the association's endorsement of legislation which would provide for the establishment of public defender offices in the U.S. courts, and alternatively for the provision of counsel to indigent defendants through the employment by the United States of the services of bar associations, legal aid societies, defender organizations, or individually appointed and paid attorneys in those jurisdictions where such systems appear to be more desirable in the light of local conditions.

Mr. JAVITS. Although the sixth amendment to the Constitution states that every accused person is entitled to the assistance of counsel for his defense, regardless of ability to pay, the widespread practice of assigning lawyers to represent indigent defendants usually without compensation is often haphazard and ineffectual. Legal authorities agree that it does not always result in the proper administration of justice.

According to the National Legal Aid and Defender Association, from mid-1957 through mid-1958, more than 50 percent of all defendants in criminal court cases in 106 major cities were unable to afford legal counsel. For example, the number of indigent defendants in Oakland, Calif., was reported to be 60 percent of the total; in New York City, over 50 percent; in Chicago, Ill., 55 percent; and in Boston, Mass., 75 percent. The association further reports that some type of public defender system, supported by the State or local government, or provided by voluntary groups like legal aid societies does exist in 16 States. However, in 27 counties in the United States with a total population of about 20 million there is no such service available and indigent defendants must rely solely upon lawyers who may be appointed by the courts.

The inadequacy of the present system is apparent in the results disclosed by one national survey which estimated that 4 out of every 10 indigent defendants held on criminal charges received no legal assistance whatsoever. Of the remaining 60 percent who did have some sort of aid, only about one-third received an effective defense, it was reported.

Such studies, substantiating testimony by legal experts and my own firsthand experience in developing a public defender program for youths under 21 while attorney general of New York State, have convinced me that Federal legislation is required, if the scales of justice are to be kept in balance in cases involving indigent defendants. They must never be weighted against the accused because he is financially unable to employ a skilled, experienced lawyer to defend him.

Granted that it is the duty of the prosecuting attorney to protect the innocent as well as prosecute the guilty, but, in practice, the district attorney or U.S. attorney is most effective in presentation of evidence against the person charged with a criminal offense. If the accused person's constitutional guarantee is to have real meaning, then his lawyer must be equally able and willing to counter with an adequate defense.

The proposal I am introducing would provide that each U.S. district court may appoint a public defender to be paid out of Federal funds, the sum to be fixed by the Judiciary Conference of the United States based upon services to be performed. Provision is made for a maximum salary of $16,000 per annum or an amount $2,500 less than the salary of the U.S. attorney in the district, whichever is lower. Ninety percent of the U.S. attorneys are paid between $12,500 and $15,000 annually, and the remainder receive between $18,000 and $20,000 per year. Whenever the court decides that a defendant is too poor to hire counsel, it may assign the public defender. However, the bill preserves the court's present power to appoint counsel other than the public defender and such counsel is to be paid on a case-by-case basis, with daily compensation not to exceed $100.

There is a key provision in the bill authorizing the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts upon recommendation of the Judicial Conference to make grants to bar associations, legal aid societies and similar groups giving free legal services to indigent defendants with the aggregate amount of any such grants made annually to any judicial district shall not exceed $30,000. There are undoubtedly several areas in the country where a small expenditure of Federal funds would enable legal aid societies to expand materially the volume of work they now handle.

In New York City, where it is estimated that nearly 6 out of every 10 persons accused of criminal cases seek voluntary legal aid, the local legal aid society reports that it assisted 35,123 indigent defendants during 1958. In the Federal courts of the southern and eastern districts which take in New York and 11 neighboring counties, the society was called upon to represent one or more defendants in almost 70 percent of all criminal cases tried in them.

The facts show that indigent defendants in the courts, under the present system, which varies from district to district, and is generally based upon the assignment of members of the bar who largely volunteer for the purpose, is not working adequately. That fact is recognized by the local U.S. attorneys and by the Attorney General of the United States, as well as by the bar associations of the country.

We have had a great deal of experience with public defenders, as this system is in force in many places, and, on the whole, is found to give very large benefits to the public.

Finally, our bill proposes to utilize the legal aid societies, bar associations, and similar groups, many of which now render free legal services to defendants in criminal cases—free legal services for which the Government ought to pay a reasonable sum, because it would attract more lawyers on a more constant basis, resulting in greater and more intensive preparation of the cases.

In view of the action of this body last year and the support this measure has received from so many distinguished legal authorities in the United States, I very much hope that the Congress will act on this measure at this session.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT, TO EQUALIZE RIGHTS IN DISTRIBUTION OF CERTAIN MERCHANDISE

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill designed to safeguard our Nation's small-business men from predatory and destructive price-cutting tactics. Cosponsoring this measure with me is the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

A companion measure to this bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative OREN HARRIS, chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

As will be recalled, substantially similar fair trade bills were introduced in the last session of Congress by Representative HARRIS on the House side and by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] and myself for the Senate. Extensive public hearings on the merits of these bills were held by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committees of both the House and the Senate, respectively. Subsequently, the House Committee's Subcommittee on Commerce and Finance reported favorably on the fair trade measure which Congressman Harris had introduced. Unfortunately, however, the legislative logjam which then developed in the rush for adjournment prevented any further action from being taken by the House. On the Senate side, too, the adjournment stymied all efforts to take final action on our fair trade bill.

In introducing this bill, I am hopeful that public attention will be brought directly to bear upon the grave competitive threat which loss-leader selling and related pricing practices pose for small-business men. It is my desire to see stimulated among thoughtful people in all walks of life a free and open discussion of this bill, its provisions and general objectives. Once a full understanding is had of the basic competitive problems under attack, I am confident that a sound and constructive solution, consistent with the public interest, can be found.

Both in principle and purpose, the proposed national fair trade bill corresponds closely to the individual State fair trade laws. Each type of legislation has as its objective the maintenance of fair and orderly pricing practices in the distribution of trademarked and trade-named products. In each case, this goal is to be achieved by means of resale price maintenance, that is, in the promotion of fair-trade competition. Each limits the right of resale price control to manufacturers having a trademarked or trade-named product in free and open competition with similar commodities. Each authorizes private enforcement by injured parties. Each gives any qualified manufacturer a basic right to decide freely for himself whether or not he shall adopt a system of resale price maintenance. Moreover, each has a common interest in protecting a manufacturer's property right in his trademark or trade name from injurious pricing practices. It need hardly be added that each type of law finds its social and economic justification in the maintenance of a vital and prosperous small-business community, free from the threat of ruinous price cutting.

In commending this legislative proposal to the earnest consideration of my colleagues, I am reassured by a knowledge of the sympathetic treatment which Congress has traditionally accorded the problems of small business. Through the years, Congress has been always willing to take whatever action was necessary to protect small-business interests. Such efforts have been evidenced particularly in the area of legislation prohibiting destructive pricing practices.

All of us are familiar with the important role played by Congress in the development of fair trade at the Federal level. At that time, fair trade was relatively ineffective because of its inability to function in interstate commerce. To resolve the difficulty, Congress passed the Miller-Tydings Act. Again, in 1952, when fair trade competition seemed destroyed by the Supreme Court's decision in the Schewegmann case, Congress proceeded to revitalize fair trade by passing the McGuire Act, a measure which expressly sanctioned enforcement of fair-trade prices against nonsigning retailers. In addition, it may be pointed out, almost all of us in Congress have spoken publicly in support of fair-trade competition and its many practical benefits to all segments of our economy.

Largely as a result of the unique Federal exemptive status which Congress has established for fair trade, the system has won acceptance in the marketplaces of the Nation. Manufacturers, wholesalers, retailers, and consumers, too, have come to recognize the advantages of fair-trade competition and now depend heavily upon its continued effective operation. Congress must carefully guard against breaking faith with those small businessmen whose survival depend upon a strong and vigorous fair-trade system. Though this responsibility is indeed great, I am fuly confident that Congress will discharge it as successfully as has always been done in the past.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk for one week to afford other Senators an opportunity to join as cosponsors of the measure, if they so desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota.

The bill (S. 1083) to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended, so as to equalize rights in the distribution of merchandise identified by a trademark, brand, or trade name, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and Mr. PROXMIRE), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PROTECTION OF VOTING RIGHTS

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I introduce a bill and a joint resolution and ask that they be appropriately referred.

Mr. President, these two measures, taken singly or together, would signify a great stride toward the long-sought goal of insuring and protecting the voting rights of all Americans.

I have been impressed by the number of civil rights measures introduced in the Senate thus far in the 86th Congress.

There is S. 810, which I was pleased to cosponsor with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS]; there is the bill introduced by the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], and there is even an administration measure.

In fact, the sudden profusion of civil rights bills this year is rather heartening to those of us who have been carrying on this fight for some years.

It is almost as if our quest for equal rights and protection for all Americans had suddenly become respectable.

Mr. President, enactment of every one of the provisions in the bills I have mentioned would be helpful in the protection of civil rights, even though one or two may be designed more for public relations purposes than to fill the real need.

Nevertheless, there is one area that needs still more attention. That is insuring the constitutional right of all Americans to vote.

The preliminary findings of the Federal Civil Rights Commission have pointed up the fact that many thousands of Americans apparently are being denied their right to vote.

The measures I introduce today are designed to put a stop to this intolerable situation.

One is a bill to implement section 2 of the 14th amendment to the Constitution, a section which provides that any State which denies or abridges the rights of any of its citizens to vote, shall have its representation in the House of Representatives reduced proportionately.

My bill would establish a Joint Committee on Congressional Representation, which would meet following each election to determine whether violations have occured.

Following the committee's report on whether any State should have the number of Representatives reduced, Congress would have an opportunity to disapprove the committee's findings.

The joint resolution I introduce proposes an amendment to the Constitution setting forth maximum qualifications for voting in Federal elections.

These maximum qualifications would require U.S. citizenship, 1 year's residence in the State, and attainment of the age of 21.

These would, of course, not apply to persons adjudged mentally incompetent or those deprived of civil rights because of criminal conviction.

However, the point is that stating maximum qualifications beyond which no State could go in Federal elections, would automatically put an end to many abuses.

I am aware that the Constitution permits each State to set the qualifications for electors.

But I am also aware of the 14th amendment which I have already described, the 15th amendment which makes illegal denial or abridgement of the right to vote because of race or color, and the 19th amendment, which gave women the right to vote.

These precedent-setting amendments clearly establish the Federal Government's right to set qualifications in Federal elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill and joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill and joint resolution, introduced by Mr. MCNAMARA, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

S. 1084. A bill providing for the reduction of the congressional representation of States denying or abridging the right of its inhabitants to vote, and for other purposes; and

S.J. Res. 51. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prescribing maximum qualifications for voters in Federal elections.

AMENDMENT OF FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, RELATING TO EXTENSION OF COVERAGE

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for hired farm labor employed by large farm enterprises, and for other purposes.

This bill is companion legislation to the bill introduced on Monday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], which I have sponsored, to increase the minimum wage and to extend coverage of that law.

The bill I introduce today would extend the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act to agricultural employees on the larger farms.

It would not affect the so-called family farm or those with only a few casual employees.

The provisions would apply to farm enterprises using more than 2,244 mandays of hired farm labor during a calendar year.

In all fairness to the employees, I would much prefer that they be given the immediate protection of the full minimum wage, either the current $1 an hour or the $1.25 proposed in the bill offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

However, it is recognized that the sudden increase to $1 or $1.25 from the extremely poor wage now being paid most farm workers could effect undue hardship on some employers.

Therefore, my bill proposes that the full minimum wage level be reached in a series of annual stages.

Under this plan, the minimum farm wage would be 75 cents an hour the first year, 85 cents the second year, $1 the third year, and the statutory minimum wage, whatever it may then be, the fourth year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1085) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for hired farm labor employed by large farm enterprises, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MCNAMARA (for himself and Mr. CLARK), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

CONSTRUCTION AT CERTAIN MILITARY INSTALLATIONS

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes.

This bill is requested by the Department of Defense and is accompanied by a letter of transmittal explaining the purpose of the bill.

I ask that the letter of transmittal be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1086) to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. RUSSELL (for himself and Mr. SALTONSTALL), by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

The letter presented by Mr. RUSSELL is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, February 10, 1959.

Honorable RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is forwarded herewith a draft of legislation to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes.

This proposed legislation is a part of the Department of Defense legislative program for 1959, and the Bureau of the Budget advises that there is no objection to its presentation to the Congress. The Department of Defense recommends that it be enacted.

This proposed legislation would authorize additional military construction that is urgently needed by the Department of Defense at this time, and would provide additional authority to cover deficiencies in prior construction authorizations. The appropriation of money required for construction is provided for in the Budget of the U.S. Government for the Fiscal Year 1960.

This legislation consists of titles I, II, and III, covering authorization required for the active forces of the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force; title IV, covering general provisions relating to the foregoing titles; and title V, covering authorization required for the respective Reserve components.

For the Active Forces this proposal would authorize new construction totaling $1,299,297,000, of which $231,252,000 is for the Department of the Army, $195,284,000 is for the Department of the Navy, and $872,761,000 is for the Department of the Air Force. This proposal would also provide additional monetary authority to correct deficiencies in authorization for projects authorized under previous laws totaling $4,379,000, of which $1,186,000 is for the Army, $850,000 is for the Navy, and $2,343,000 is for the Air Force. Therefore, the total in this proposed legislation of new authorization, plus additional monetary authority for projects previously authorized, amounts to $1,303,676,000 for the Active Forces.

This proposal would also repeal as of July 1, 1960, all authorizations, with certain exceptions, for military construction for the Active Forces that are contained in laws enacted prior to August 31, 1957. This repeal will continue in effect the policy established in the fiscal year 1956 Military Construction Authorization Act (Public Law 161, 84th Cong.) of repealing long-standing authority that has not been exercised by the military departments. It is believed that the continuation of this policy will result in a construction program which will reflect more accurately the current needs of the Department of Defense.

For the Reserve components the proposal would authorize construction totaling $56,993,000, of which $20,748,000 is for the Army Reserve, $8,316,000 is for the Army National Guard, $8,300,000 is for the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves, $4,093,000 is for the Air Force Reserve, and $15,536,000 is for the Air National Guard. It would also provide additional monetary authority to correct deficiencies in authorization for certain projects contained in Public Law 85-685 totaling $560,000, of which $470,000 is for the Air National Guard and $90,000 is for the Army Reserve. Therefore, the total of new authorization, plus additional monetary authority for projects previously authorized, amounts to $57,553,000 for the Reserve components. This proposed legislation also provides for the rescission of authorization contained in Public Law 85-685 for certain installations which are no longer required.

Accordingly, the total authorization requested in this legislation for both the Active

Forces and the Reserve components amounts to $1,361,229,000.

Sincerely yours,

NEIL MCELROY.

YOUTH OPPORTUNITY PROGRAM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to discuss today some of the problems we face in expanding opportunity for our Nation's young people and to offer a program for action, a youth opportunity program.

These problems—and the action we take to solve them—will have the most far-reaching effects on the future of our country, both in terms of our own national development and in terms of the long-range competition we must expect in this tense and divided world. These problems deserve our most dedicated attention.

The problems and requirements of our Nation's youth confront us with a mounting challenge and responsibility which we cannot afford to shirk. We must plan and act now if the United States is to provide full opportunity for self-development of all our young people, regardless of their race, religion, family economic background, geographical residence, or comparative abilities.

Our country is rich in natural resources. But our most precious resource is our people—our loyal, skilled, and informed citizens. We must provide ample opportunity for our citizens—especially our young people—to develop themselves through education, recreation, and employment. Such self-development will, of course, make our young people ever more valuable national assets in this increasingly complex technological era we are in.

But furthermore, when we provide opportunity for self-development we are strengthening the free, independent spirit of the individual citizen, the bedrock of our democracy.

Passage of the National Defense Education Act last year represents a growing public awareness—and an awareness by Congress—of the need to expand opportunity for our young people. This act is a beginning step on the path we must follow if we are to give adequate attention and care to our young people in their crucial, formative years.

The problems of our Nation's youth fall into two major divisions. On one hand we have the academic problems. We must provide adequate educational opportunities. On the other hand, we have the nonacademic problems—recreation, juvenile delinquency, rehabilitation, and the problems of our young people as they enter the labor force.

In the academic field we still face enormous challenges in spite of the progress achieved in the National Defense Education Act. Many qualified, able young people are still prevented from attending institutions of higher learning because of family or personal financial pressures. Even so, these institutions face enrollment pressures simply because of the expanding population, especially in the lower age brackets. Our schools still face serious classroom shortages as well as shortages of qualified teachers.

The nonacademic challenges to our American traditions of opportunity are equally obvious. We must provide recreational facilities for youthful activities in healthy surroundings. We must bridge the gap between high school and employment for those who are not going on to further education. We must explore new methods for the rehabilitation of delinquent youths and we must strike at the roots of juvenile delinquency.

Mr. President, like most of my colleagues, I have been seriously concerned about these problems for many years. Early in the 85th Congress I introduced a comprehensive youth opportunity program. Today I am sending to the desk a similar, comprehensive program to deal with these crucial problems which loom so urgently on our national agenda. I am happy to report that the distinguished Representative from the 26th District of California, the Honorable JAMES ROOSEVELT, is introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives.

Again I solicit suggestions and constructive amendments. There is no claim for perfection in my youth opportunity program but I believe these problems of our young people deserve the active interest not only of all Members of Congress but also the informed interest of the American people as a whole. The problems are pressing. I hope this Congress will sense their urgency.

EDUCATION

Last year the National Defense Education Act was passed, I think, largely because many Members of Congress viewed such legislation as an answer to Soviet sputniks and ICBM's. I do not want to detract from the contributions of this act, although I deeply regret that college scholarships and provisions to alleviate our shortage of classrooms were deleted in the final version. I submit, however, that the problems we face in the field of education require our attention regardless of Soviet technical progress.

The strength of our democracy depends on the kind of education and training available to our citizens. If we can afford a defense budget of more than $40 billion a year for national security, we certainly should be willing to devote a small fraction of this amount to the urgent educational needs of our young people as an equally important investment in preserving and improving our American way of life.

Mr. President, the future progress and well-being of our American society depends on our action in the field of education. Our society is now in a period of rapid change. We face increasing complexities and hazards, both technical and moral. It is absolutely essential that we bring educational opportunities to the highest talent of each generation to meet and to master the social and scientific challenges of our time.

Educators have estimated that there are at present more than 150,000 young men and women in the United States who rank in the upper 12 percent of the population's intellectual range, but who cannot go to college because they lack the necessary means. The loan program of the National Defense Education Act, with its encouragement for recipients to enter the teaching profession, is sound, but the program merely scratches the surface in providing assistance for qualified high school graduates who lack financial resources.

It is a great waste of valuable resources—human resources—to let young people with outstanding mental ability be deprived of a college education because of financial difficulties. With this thought in mind, I am proposing a college scholarship program to raise the standards of educational systems throughout our country and to promote the future progress of our entire Nation.

Rising enrollments, both in institutions of higher learning and in elementary and secondary schools, are putting an increasing burden on the ability of State and local governments to meet the costs of education. My youth opportunity program includes authorization for school construction assistance. It also includes provisions for assistance to the institutions of higher learning which face expanding costs in accepting students who receive Federal financial aid.

Mr. President, in my youth opportunity program, a comprehensive attempt to meet basic educational needs is made in three separate bills which I send to the desk today. These three bills are entitled the "Student Aid Act of 1959," the "School Construction Act of 1959," and the "Educational Tax Credit Act of 1959."

STUDENT AID ACT

First, I turn to consideration of my Student Aid Act which would establish a Federal scholarship program. The need for this program is clear. A survey by the Office of Education indicates that more than 70,000 qualified students who requested financial aid from our colleges and universities were denied scholarship assistance in 1957–58.

Under my proposal, at least 46,000 young men and women each year will be able to enter these institutions of higher learning with the help of Federal scholarships of varying amounts.

Appropriations would begin in fiscal 1960 with $46 million. They are to increase by $46 million each year until fiscal 1963, when appropriations would level off at $184 million a year.

The scholarships are to be awarded to high-school students everywhere in the United States for higher education, free, of course, from discriminations for reasons of sex, creed, or race. Each State is to have its quota of scholarships based on a formula providing that one-half of the total number of scholarships shall be allotted among the States in percentages equal to the percentage the State's high-school graduates bear to the national total of high-school graduates for the year. The remaining one-half of the total number of scholarships are to be allotted in the proportion that the State's population between 19 and 21 bears to the national total population of that age.

Any high-school graduate would be eligible to apply for a scholarship and each student who wins a certificate of scholarship from his State education agency will automatically get an annual $500 merit scholarship, regardless of his financial need. Such merit awards for outstanding scholastic achievement will stimulate high-school students to take courses qualifying them for entrance to college and will stimulate them to do their best to win a scholarship. These merit awards will also stimulate parents to encourage their children to work hard at the difficult courses.

Furthermore, I believe the most significant accomplishment of these merit scholarships will be their effect in raising the whole level of secondary education throughout the United States. The Nation's high schools will compete among themselves for the honor of graduating Federal scholarship winners and parents will insist that their local schools provide the courses, the teachers, and the laboratory equipment essential for proper study, particularly in science, mathematics, and modern languages. Thus, the scholarship program which I am proposing would become an enormous incentive to the schools, the students, and their parents to upgrade the level of academic achievement in the high schools across our Nation.

The State agencies which select the recipients of scholarship funds will also choose from the winners of scholarship certificates those needy students who require more scholarship assistance in addition to the merit award. These needy scholars could get amounts varying with their demonstrated need, but there would be a limit of $1,500 per recipient per academic year for a maximum of 4 years.

A scholarship winner can attend any bona fide college or university which admits him. So long as he continues in good standing, his stipend will be paid directly to him in installments suited to the academic year.

The only further qualifications for scholarships are that the recipient must apply in accordance with State rules; he must have a recognized certificate of graduation from high school; he must not be eligible for veterans' educational benefits; and he must not have had any Federal scholarship under this or any other act vacated, except for good cause.

During a time of active hostilities or when found by the President to be necessary for national defense, at least 60 percent of the stipends must go to students engaging in studies determined to be related to national defense or to defense-supporting activities.

My bill also provides for consultation between the Office of Education and the various Federal agencies such as the Atomic Energy Commission, the National Science Foundation, and the Department of Defense, which operate special programs of aid to undergraduate and graduate students so as to assure full coordination of the Federal scholarship program with other federally supported programs.

This act is to be administered by the Commissioner of Education, assisted by the National Council on Student Aid, a body of 12 members representing organizational and professional interests.

However, the bill makes it very clear that there will be no Federal direction, supervision, or control over the curriculum or program of instruction of any educational institution. The State scholarship commissions which carry out the provisions of my Student Aid Act will receive applications from students; they will conduct the tests to select the scholarship winners; they will assess the financial need of those qualifying for scholarships, and they will allot the amount of the stipend in each case.

FACILITIES ASSISTANCE

Clearly, Mr. President, institutions already burdened with swollen enrollments ought not to be expected to handle additionally expanded student bodies, as a result of the new scholarship program, without some consideration being given to easing the pressure on existing facilities by assisting in their expansion. Legislation ought not to ease the financial burden currently barring talented youth from college attendance while ignoring the disproportionately increased load placed on the educational institutions by the increased attendance. We do not solve our total problems by solving a difficulty at one end of the spectrum which will create a new one at the other.

Therefore, Mr. President, I have tried in the Student Aid Act of 1959 to suggest a means of compensating the institution itself for its estimated costs of providing education to the new scholarship holder over and above the amounts it receives from the student for providing the education. In my bill, the Commissioner of Education is instructed to work out a formula with each institution on a cost-of-services-rendered basis, including an amount for instruction, plant operation, administration, library costs, and any other costs reasonably allocable to providing educational services. The student himself would technically be the carrier of this grant, not to exceed $500 per year per scholarship student. The grant would follow from his choice of institution and would be payable to that institution on a basis worked out separately between the Commissioner and the institution.

The cost formula technique admittedly leaves some discretion in the hands of the Commissioner who, incidentally, will also be advised by the National Council established in the bill. The formula feature has nevertheless seemed advisable, because it has appeared to be desirable to go beyond any simple cost of instruction, teaching salary, flat grant or customary fees and charges basis for reimbursement for institutional costs. Past experience, under the G.I. bill particularly, has proved these factors to be highly ambiguous, unstable and unsatisfactory. I frankly offer this proposal on facilities assistance, aware of the difficulties involved, in the hope that the proposal may be further refined and improved. Of its fundamental equity and necessity, I have no doubt at all.

INCOME TAX CREDIT

Mr. President, my next proposal, the Educational Tax Credit Act of 1959, is designed to give additional stimulus to education by providing tax credits for parents who are paying for tuition and fees of those attending our institutions of higher learning. The costs of education are a heavy burden on many low and middle income families.

The Educational Tax Credit Act provides for a 30-percent credit against income tax for payments by the taxpayer to educational institutions during the taxable year for the cost of tuition and fees above the 12th grade. A $450 limit is imposed on this tax credit per year.

This provision, in other words, would permit any individual to charge off against his net income tax—not to exceed $450 in any taxable year—30 percent of the cost of tuition and fees which that individual may pay for the education of himself or any other individual.

The purpose of this legislation is self-evident. Both as an inducement for higher education and as a relief measure for the family budget, we would be removing a serious handicap for many American family budgets by adopting this bill.

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. President, I now turn to my school construction proposal. This bill, the School Construction Act of 1959, is similar to bills I introduced in the 84th and 85th Congresses. It is the result of extensive hearings in the Senate and the House during the past several years.

At this point I wish to pay tribute to the distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] who has labored so long and so well to provide financial support for school construction and teachers' salaries. I am proud to join the Senator as a cosponsor of his School Support Act in this 86th Congress.

My proposal, intended to supplement this important legislation, would provide general authorization for Federal financial assistance to the States to help build schools and additional classrooms. Enactment of my bill would put the stamp of approval by Congress on the principle of Federal financial aid in this crucial field. Of course, my bill will leave responsibility for administering actual construction with the State and local school authorities who are acquainted with local needs.

Also, my bill contains explicit prohibition against any Federal direction, supervision or control over the personnel, curriculum or program of any school system. The Federal Government will be a financial partner with the States and local school districts in constructing schools where they are most needed in each State, but the actual planning and construction of the schools will be left to the State education agencies and to the local school districts within each State.

Mr. President, conservative estimates of the Office of Education indicate a current national shortage of more than 140,000 classrooms. In spite of ambitious local school building programs in the past 2 years, there is, in addition to these pressing backlog classroom needs, an urgent need for additional classrooms just to meet increased student enrollment which rises as our population rises. Information collected by the White House Conference on Education indicated that we need 50,000 new classrooms a year simply to handle increasing enrollments.

These 50,000 new classrooms needed each year we would have to build even if we ignored the unsatisfactory, overcrowded, dangerous classrooms we have now.

In my School Construction Act, the amount of Federal funds to be expended is left unspecified. This amount would be determined by Congress. The funds would be distributed to the States according to the number of persons 5 to 17 years of age in each State. The States and local school districts would be required to match the Federal funds dollar for dollar.

In order to make certain that the Federal funds will not be substituted for State and local funds that would otherwise be spent for school construction, each State educational agency will be required to submit a State plan of operation. This State plan would describe the program developed in each State and would provide for reports to the Commissioner of Education on how the Federal funds have been spent.

The most important aspect of the State plan required by my bill would be the requirement that each State sets forth principles for determining the relative priority of school construction projects, taking into account the relative financial resources of local school districts, the relative local efforts made to meet school needs out of State and local funds, and the relative urgency of local school facility needs in the light of overcrowding and use of unsafe and obsolete facilities.

Ten years ago, during the 81st Congress, I was chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on School Construction. Our hearings even then showed an urgent need for action by Congress to alleviate the classroom shortage. Even then, hearings disclosed untold numbers of children attending school in unsafe firetraps, going to school in shifts like factory workers—a sorry reflection on the values of our society.

I am proud to have sponsored Public Law 815 of the 81st Congress in which we provided financial aid for school construction in federally impacted areas. Under this law and Public Law 874, which provides for aid in school maintenance and operation in such areas, Congress has appropriated more than $1½ billion for Federal aid to schools. Eight hundred and seventy-six million and fifty thousand dollars has been appropriated for school construction aid since 1951 under Public Law 815 and $748,170,000 has been appropriated since that time under Public Law 874.

Last July, independent testimony before the Education Subcommittee of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee showed conclusively that there has been no Federal control in the administration of this financial assistance. Testimony also showed that local citizens in school districts receiving Federal aid have maintained or increased their own financial efforts for their local schools.

Our State and local governments still need help. Perhaps it is too much to expect leadership from the White House in such a crucial field which affects the education of millions of schoolchildren. Nevertheless, I hope we in Congress will fulfill our responsibilities by acting soon to provide Federal aid for school construction.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

And now, Mr. President, I turn to some of the nonacademic aspects of the problems facing our Nation's young people. No one can concern himself with the field of youth opportunity without considering our mounting problem of juvenile delinquency.

This problem is increasing at an accelerating tempo. From 1952 to 1957 arrests of young people under 18 years of age have increased 2½ times as fast as the population growth in the 10- to 17-year-old bracket. Since 1949 we have seen a steady increase in national delinquency statistics—a rise that far outstrips the growth of our child population. Statistics from the Children's Bureau indicate that juvenile delinquency cases increased by more than 200 percent between 1948 and 1956 while the child population increased in the same period by only 19 percent. The FBI Uniform Crime Report for 1957 shows that police arrests of young people under 18 years of age increased by 9.8 percent over the previous year.

Testimony before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare during the 84th Congress showed that 1 out of every 13 children in the Nation between 10 and 17 years of age was in trouble with the law in 1954 and the report warned that the spiraling increase of juvenile delinquency—if it continues unchecked—will see 2 million children in trouble with police by 1960.

The first move, of course, is to prevent youngsters from taking the first misstep. We should anticipate and prevent. The second move is to help youngsters out of trouble who have gotten into it and to put them on the road to rehabilitation and useful citizenship.

All this is well within the compass of Federal legislation to check. Juvenile delinquency is not solely a big-city problem, although, of course, it is more acute in urban areas. The 1957 uniform crime report shows arrests of juveniles increased more in cities with populations under 25,000 than in larger cities—16 percent as against 8.1 percent in the bigger cities. And a study of 520,000 juvenile court cases in 1956 showed that 24 percent were in semiurban areas and 11 percent were in rural areas.

The point I wish to make is that the problem of juvenile delinquency is national in scope and needs Federal as well as State and local attention.

Therefore, Mr. President, I reintroduce the Delinquent Children's Act, which provides for a highly enlightened approach to a serious problem which concerns us all. As in the earlier measures I have mentioned as part of my youth opportunity program, the broadest possible allowances are made for local direction, local autonomy, and local decision.

A Federal Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency is created in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. Its function is to advise the Secretary and to present programs for decreasing the delinquency problem, and for its control and treatment. The Council is to submit an annual report and such other reports as it deems fit, discussing the problem, the progress made in attacking it, and recommendations for the future. The bill authorizes the Council to comment upon applications for special projects and authorizes the Secretary to utilize the services of Council members. Appropriations are authorized for State and local programs. These call for $5 million for fiscal 1960; $6,500,000 for fiscal 1961; and $10 million for fiscal 1962, and for each of the following 4 fiscal years such sums as the Congress may determine.

The allotments to each State are to be made on the basis of the ratio its child population bears to the total child population of all the States. Each State is permitted a minimum allotment of $50,000. For the first year that the bill is in force there is authorization for the appropriation of $5 million for the purpose of making grants for the training of personnel in nonprofit institutions of higher learning and for developing courses for such training.

Other financial provisions are made that are customary in legislation of this nature. These seek to make its administration economical, and fair to all the States and the Federal Treasury, and are aimed at fulfilling the major purposes of diminishing, controlling and treating juvenile delinquency in the United States. The Secretary is thus authorized to render technical assistance to the States, to disseminate reports and information, and to give out the results of investigations. The Secretary may make payments under this title in advance or by way of reimbursement.

Mr. President, it is my earnest hope that the Senate will proceed to early adoption of the Delinquent Children's Act and that the House will concur during the present session of Congress.

YOUTH CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. President, at this point I would like to call attention to a proposal I made earlier in this session. I consider my proposal for a Youth Conservation Corps, S. 812, an integral part of this comprehensive youth opportunity program which I am sending to the desk today.

Clearly we could take a gigantic step forward in prevention of delinquency and in improving the physical fitness of our young people if we provide healthful, useful outdoor work and educational opportunities for 150,000 boys and young men who have too much time on their hands and not enough employment opportunities available for them.

Many young people who drop out of high school, and even many high-school graduates, find it difficult to get employment in constructive, satisfying activities. Many young men who do not go on to college enter a labor market which is already crowded. In time of recession these young people find even less opportunity for employment.

I believe we must once again provide the kind of opportunity for creative work on the land which many American boys found in the Civilian Conservation Corps in the thirties. Therefore, I include my Youth Conservation Act as a part of the youth opportunity program which I am introducing today.

CONCLUSION

In summary, Mr. President, the purpose of my youth opportunity program is to supplement and to help existing public and private agencies in the vital job of preparing our young citizens to master the problems which will face them and their children in the years to come. It is no exaggeration to describe this youth program as a national defense program, for it will make our citizens better trained and better prepared to live and to work in our free society—and better prepared to defend it.

My youth program is flexible. It is adapted to our needs, to our resources, and to our capabilities. I do not want one solution to loom so large as to blind us to others, and, therefore, I am offering a comprehensive, balanced program to help our young people. It is a simple program.

I want to provide college scholarships for our outstanding high-school students.

I want our colleges and universities to get help to meet the costs of rising enrollments.

I want to build schools so our children can get a decent education in decent surroundings.

I want to give liberal tax write-offs to parents sending their children on to college.

I want to attack the complex juvenile delinquency problem by prevention and rehabilitation.

I want to provide healthy, constructive work for boys in their late teens—conservation projects in our national parks and forests in the great American outdoors.

We have a grave responsibility to our Nation to act on these proposals. This Youth Opportunity Program provides the Senate of the United States with an opportunity to help in the development of our Nation's greatest asset—our young people, to whom we entrust the future.

With these measures we can properly utilize Government action for the national welfare while preserving and strengthening our basic principles of personal initiative and private property.

I hope the Senate of the United States will accept the challenge and the opportunity.

Mr. President, I send to the desk the four bills I have discussed today, plus an omnibus measure combining them, and including my Youth Conservation Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills referred to by the Senator from Minnesota will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred, as indicated:

To the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. 1087. A bill to establish a program of scholarship aid to students in higher education and to provide facilities assistance to institutions of higher education;

S. 1088. A bill to authorize Federal payments to the States to assist in constructing schools;

S. 1090. A bill to provide for assistance to and cooperation with States in strengthening and improving State and local programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency; and

S. 1091. A bill to provide school construction assistance to the States; to establish a program of scholarship aid to students in higher education; to provide facilities assistance to institutions of higher education; to provide a 30 percent credit against the Federal individual income tax for amounts paid as tuition or fees to certain public and private institutions of higher education; to provide for assistance to and cooperation with States in strengthening and improving State and local programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency; to establish a Youth Conservation Corps; and for other purposes.

To the Committee on Finance:

S. 1089. A bill to provide a 30 percent credit against the Federal individual income tax for amounts paid as tuition or fees to certain public and private institutions of higher education.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Student Aid Act of 1959, the School Construction Act of 1959, the Educational Tax Credit Act of 1959, and the Delinquent Children's Act of 1959 be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1087

A bill to establish a program of scholarship aid to students in higher education and to provide facilities assistance to institutions of higher education.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Short title

SEC. 101. This Act may be cited as the "Student Aid Act of 1959".

Federal control of education prohibited

SEC. 102. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to authorize any department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States to exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the curriculum or program of instruction of any educational institution or, except as provided in sections 207, 305, and 306(d), over its administration or personnel.

Administration

SEC. 103. (a) This Act shall be administered by the Commissioner of Education, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. The Commissioner shall, with the approval of the Secretary, make all regulations specifically authorized to be made under this Act and such other regulations, not inconsistent with this Act, as may be necessary to carry out its purposes. The Commissioner is authorized to delegate to any officer or employee of the Office of Education any of his powers and duties under this Act, except the making of regulations.

(b) In administering the provisions of this Act, the Commissioner is authorized to utilize the services and facilities of any agency of the Federal Government and, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, of any other public or nonprofit agency or institution, in accordance with agreements between the Secretary and the head thereof. Payment for such services and facilities shall be made in advance or by way of reimbursement, as may be agreed upon by the Secretary and the head of the agency or institution.

(c) The Commissioner shall, with the advice and assistance of the National Council, make or cause to have made studies, investigations, and reports of the effectiveness of the student aid program established by this Act, and prescribe objective tests and other measures of ability for the selection of individuals to be awarded certificates of scholarship.

(d) At the beginning of each regular session of the Congress, the Commissioner shall make through the Secretary a full report to Congress of the administration of this Act, including his recommendations for needed revisions.

(e) The Secretary shall advise and consult with the heads of executive departments or independent establishments of the Federal Government responsible for the administration of scholarship, fellowship, student-loan or facilities assistance programs, with a view to the full coordination of all specialized scholarship, fellowship, student-loan, and facilities assistance programs administered by or under all departments and establishments of the Federal Government with the general programs established by this Act.

(f) When deemed necessary by the Commissioner for the effective administration of this Act, experts or consultants may be employed as provided in section 15 of the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946 (5 U.S.C. 55a).

National Council on Student Aid

SEC. 104. (a) There is hereby established a National Council on Student Aid, consisting of the Commissioner, as chairman, and twelve members appointed without regard to the civil-service laws by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. The twelve appointed members shall be so selected that the Council will be broadly representative of the individual, organizational, and professional interests in education, and of the public. Each appointed member of the Council shall hold office for a term of four years, except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the remainder of such term, and except that, of the members first appointed, three shall hold office for a term of three years, three shall hold office for a term of two years, and three shall hold office for a term of one year, as designated by the Commissioner at the time of appointment. None of such twelve members shall be eligible for reappointment until a year has elapsed since the end of his preceding term.

(b) The Council shall advise the Commissioner as specifically indicated in this Act and assist and advise him with respect to other matters of basic policy arising in the administration of this Act.

(c) Persons appointed to the Council shall, while serving on business of the Council, receive compensation at rates fixed by the Secretary, but not to exceed $50 per day, and shall also be entitled to receive an allowance for actual and necessary travel and subsistence expenses while so serving away from their places of residence.

(d) Whenever the Council considers matter of concern to another agency of the Federal Government, the Secretary may invite the head thereof to designate a representative to be present at such consideration.

Administrative appropriations authorized

SEC. 105. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for each fiscal year thereafter, such sums as may be necessary for the cost of administering the provisions of this Act, including the administrative expenses of State commissions on Federal scholarships.

Discrimination proscribed

SEC. 106. The awarding of certificates of scholarship, and the granting of scholarship stipends under this Act shall be without regard to sex, creed, race, color, national origin, or residence.

Definitions

SEC. 107. As used in this Act—

(a) The term "State" means a State, the Canal Zone, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, or the Virgin Islands.

(b) The term "institution of higher education" means an educational institution in any State which (1) admits as regular students only persons having a secondary education or its recognized equivalent, (2) is legally authorized within its own State to provide a program of higher education, (3) offers and conducts an educational program extending at least two academic years beyond the high school, and (4) either is nonprofit and tax-supported, or is determined by the Internal Revenue Service to be an organization described in section 501 (c) (3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 as exempt from taxation under section 501 (a) of such Code.

(c) The term "Commissioner" means the Commissioner of Education.

(d) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(e) The term "State commission" means the commission on Federal scholarships established in any State for the purposes of this Act.

(f) The term "National Council" means the National Council on Student Aid established in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

TITLE II—PROGRAM OF SCHOLARSHIPS

Appropriations authorized

SEC. 201. For the purpose of providing scholarship stipends for young persons of demonstrated ability and need, to assist them to attend institutions of higher education, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, the sum of $46,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, the sum of $92,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962, the sum of $138,000,000; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1963, the sum of $184,000,000; and for each fiscal year thereafter, the sum of $184,000,000 or such greater sum as the Congress may hereafer authorize to be appropriated.

Apportionment of funds for scholarship stipends and determination of fields of study

SEC. 202. (a) The Commissioner shall for each fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, estimate the total sum from the appropriation, made for such year under the authorization in section 201, which is necessary for continuing to make payments with respect to such year to individuals receiving scholarship stipends for previous years. He shall, in accordance with regulations prescribed by him, apportion such sum among the States on the basis of the aggregate amount paid in the preceding year to scholars from each State, his estimate of changes in the number of such scholars from each State who will be eligible for continuing payments in the year for which such apportionment is made, and such other factors as he may find to be relevant.

(b) The remaining portion of such appropriation shall be available for such year for grants of new scholarship stipends. One-half of such remaining portion shall be apportioned among the States on the basis of the relative numbers of students graduating from high school in such States during the most recent year for which nationwide figures are available through the Office of Education and one-half shall be apportioned among them on the basis of the relative numbers of their total population between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, inclusive, as determined by the most recent available estimates furnished by the United States Bureau of the Census.

(c) In time of actual hostilities involving the Armed Forces of the United States, or when found by the President to be necessary in the interest of national defense, the Commissioner shall for each such year designate the percentage, uniform for all States but in no event less than 60 per centum of the total number of scholarship stipends to be paid to students engaging in fields of study which are determined, in a manner prescribed by the President, to be related to the national defense or to defense-supporting activities.

Selection of recipients of scholarship certificates and stipends

SEC. 203. (a) To be eligible to compete in any State for a certificate of scholarship, an individual (1)(A) must hold a certificate of graduation from a school in the State providing secondary education, or (B) must be determined by the State commission for the State in which the individual finished his secondary education (or, in case of an individual who finished his secondary education abroad, by the State commission for the State of which he is a resident), to have attained a level of educational advancement generally accepted as constituting the equivalent of secondary school graduation in the State; (2) must not be eligible for education and training under title II of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, or title II of the Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952; (3) must make application for such certificate of scholarship in accordance with such rules as the State commission for such State may establish; and (4) must not have had any Federal scholarship, previously granted under this or any other law, terminated or vacated for any reason (except health) which was inconsistent with continued eligibility to compete for such previous scholarship.

(b) From among those competing for certificates of scholarship for each fiscal year, the State commission shall, in accordance with the objective tests and other measures of ability prescribed by the Commissioner pursuant to section 103(c), select the individuals who, on the basis of their outstanding ability to do work in higher education, are to be awarded certificates of scholarship for such year. From among those selected for certificates of scholarship (including individuals so selected in prior years), it shall also select the individuals who, on the basis of their financial need and demonstrated ability, are to be granted scholarship stipends from the State's apportionment for new stipends made pursuant to section 202 for such year, determine the amount of stipend payable to each, and, in the case of a scholar whose stipend is to be charged against a percentage quota established pursuant to section 202(c), designate the field of study for which the stipend is to be granted. Such elections and determinations shall be made in accordance with general principles and methods, including objective measures for determining the fact and degree of financial need and the amount of the stipend, prescribed in regulations made by the Commissioner with the advice of the National Council and in accordance with percentage quotas, if any, established pursuant to section 202(c).

(c) The Commissioner shall award certificates of scholarship, and within the limits of the State's apportionment for new scholarship stipends for a fiscal year and applicable quota (if any) established pursuant to section 202(c) grant scholarship stipends, to individuals certified to him by the State commission of the State as having been selected for a certificate, or for a certificate and stipend, as the case may be, in accordance with the State plan.

Amount and duration of scholarship stipends

SEC. 204. (a) The Commissioner, with the advice of the National Council, shall prescribe regulations for determining for each academic year scholarship stipend amounts related to the scholar's financial need (objectively measured pursuant to regulations prescribed under section 203(b)), and for each such year shall fix a maximum stipend amount not in excess of $1,500. The scholarship stipend granted to any scholar under this title shall, for any academic year of the scholarship stipend's duration (as provided in subsection (b)), be the amount determined (pursuant to regulations of the Commissioner prescribed under section 203 (b) with respect to such scholar for such year by the State commission which selected him and shall be payable in such installments and at such times as the Commissioner shall prescribe.

(b) The duration of a scholarship stipend granted under this title shall be a period of time not in excess of four academic years (as defined in regulations of the Commissioner) or, subject to such regulations, such longer period as is normally required to complete the undergraduate curriculum which the recipient is pursuing; but in no event shall the duration extend beyond the completion by the recipient of the work for his first post-secondary school degree. Notwithstanding the preceding provisions of this subsection, a scholarship stipend granted under this title shall entitle the scholar to payments only while (1) the recipient is in financial need thereof, as determined annually (pursuant to regulations of the Commissioner prescribed under section 203 (b)) by the State commission which selected him, (2) the recipient devotes essentially full time to educational work in attendance and in good standing at an institution of higher education (except that failure to be in attendance at an institution during the summer months shall not by itself constitute a violation of this requirement) and, in the case of a stipend charged against a percentage quota established pursuant to section 202(c), does so in the field of study to which his stipend is restricted except as otherwise permitted pursuant to regulation, (3) the recipient is not receiving expenses of tuition or other scholarship or fellowship aid from other Federal sources (other than (A) a monetary allowance under a reserve officers' training program, or (B) compensation for work done for the institution which he is attending or any other work, regardless of the source of the funds from which such compensation is paid), and (4) in the case of a stipend holder considered for a continued payment under a stipend granted for a prior year, the amount of such payment is within the limits of the apportionment for continuing payments made pursuant to section 202(a) to the State from which such stipend holder was selected.

Place of matriculation

SEC. 205. (a) An individual granted a scholarship stipend under this title may attend any institution of higher education which has been determined as such in accordance with section 206 and which admits him, regardless of the State in which such institution is located.

(b) An individual granted a scholarship stipend under this title may attend any institution outside of the United States, its Territories, and possessions which admits him, if the Commissioner determines that such institution is substantially comparable to an institution of higher education as defined in section 107(b).

Scholarship commissions in the States

SEC. 206. (a) Any State desiring to participate in the administration of the scholarship program under this title may do so by establishing a State commission on Federal scholarships broadly representative of educational and public interests in the State and by submitting through such commission a State plan, authorized under State law, for carrying out the purposes of this title, which is approved by the Commissioner under this section. Such plan must (1) provide that it shall be administered by such commission; (2) provide for the determination of the institutions in the State which are institutions of higher education as defined in section 107(b); (3) provide for the determination, in accordance with the provisions of section 203, of eligibility to compete for certificates of scholarship, for the selection, in accordance with such provisions, of individuals to be awarded certificates of scholarship, and of individuals to be granted new scholarship stipends out of the State's apportionment, for certification of such individuals to the Commissioner, and for subsequent certification of the fact and degree of the continued financial need of, and the amounts payable to, recipients of scholarship stipends and for charging of stipends against any applicable quota established pursuant to section 202(c); (4) provide that the selection of individuals for certificates of scholarship and scholarship stipends under this title shall be made without regard to sex, creed, color, race, national origin, or residence; (5) provide for the making of such reports, in such form and containing such information, as the Commissioner shall from time to time reasonably require for the purposes of this Act, and for compliance with such provisions as the Commissioner may from time to time find reasonably necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports; and (6) indicate the official to whom funds for the administrative expenses of the State commission are to be paid.

(b) The Commissioner shall approve any plan which fulfills the condition specified in subsection (a).

(c) In the case of any State which does not establish a commission and submit and have approved a State plan in accordance with the provisions of this section, the Commissioner shall perform the functions of the State commission in such State until such time as a plan has been submitted by such a commission and is approved under this section.

(d) In the case of any State plan which has been approved by the Commissioner, if the Commissioner, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State commission administering such plan, finds (1) that the plan has been so changed that it no longer complies with the provisions of subsection (a), or (2) that in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with such provisions, the Commissioner shall notify such State commission that the State will not be regarded as eligible to participate in the program under this title until he is satisfied that there is no longer any such failure to comply. Until such time he shall perform the functions of the State commission in that State.

Payment of scholarship stipends

SEC. 207. The Commissioner shall from time to time determine the amounts payable to recipients of scholarship stipends under this title, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amounts so determined and the name of each individual to whom such amounts are to be paid. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon pay in accordance with such certification by check payable to such individual, transmitted through an official of the institution of higher education which such individual is attending. Such official shall be selected by the institution with the approval of the Commissioner. The official thus selected shall transmit such checks to the payee only upon his determination in each instance, and certification thereof to the Commissioner, that the recipient is at the time of such transmittal devoting essentially full time to educational work in attendance and in good standing at the institution, that, in the case of a student whose stipend was charged against a percentage quota determined pursuant to section 202(c), he is pursuing such studies in accordance with his designated field except as otherwise permitted pursuant to regulation, and that, so far as can be ascertained on the basis of the recipient's work at that institution, his scholarship stipend has not, under the provision of the first sentence of section 204(b), terminated. If for any reason such certification cannot be made by any such official with respect to an individual, the official shall return the check or checks involved to the drawer for cancellation.

Administrative expenses of State commissions

SEC. 208. The Commissioner shall from time to time certify to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment to the official designated in each State to receive funds for the administration of the State plan such amounts as the Commissioner determines to be necessary for the proper and efficient administration of the State plan (including reimbursement to the State for expenses which the Commissioner determines were necessary for the preparation of the State plan approved under this title). The Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon receiving such certification and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, pay to such official at the time or times fixed by the Commissioner, the amounts so certified.

TITLE III—COMPENSATION OF INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER EDUCATION FOR EDUCATIONAL SERVICES

Payments authorized

SEC. 301. The Commissioner shall pay to any institution of higher education providing education to an individual under a scholarship granted under the provisions of title II of this act such amounts not in excess of $500 per academic year as are determined by the Commissioner to be necessary to reimburse such institution for the estimated costs of services rendered in providing such education to such individual over and above amounts received from or on behalf of such individual for such services. Such amounts shall be determined in accordance with regulations established by the Commissioner with the advice of the National Council. Costs of services rendered in providing such education shall include instruction, plant operation, administration (including not more than $1.50 a month for administrative costs with respect to such scholarship), and library costs and any other costs reasonably allocable to providing educational services, but shall not include costs of services related to activities not creditable toward the attainment of a degree.

Appropriations authorized

SEC. 302. There are authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary for the payments authorized in this title.

S. 1088

A bill to authorize Federal payments to the States to assist in constructing schools

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION. 1. This Act may be cited as the "School Construction Act of 1959".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE OF ACT

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that in spite of sustained and vigorous efforts by the States and local communities to provide classrooms needed for free public education, the number of classrooms now available falls far short of the number needed. While the Congress recognizes that responsibility for educating our children lies primarily with the States and local communities, the current shortage of classrooms results from abnormal conditions which have existed throughout the United States during the past twenty-five years, and constitutes a threat to the security and welfare of the Nation as a whole. The national interest requires that the Federal Government join with State and local governments in solving this pressing problem. It is the purpose of this Act to provide for Federal payments to State educational agencies to enable the States and local communities to expand their school construction programs to the extent necessary to provide school facilities adequate to their needs.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this Act—

(1) The term "Commissioner" means the United States Commissioner of Education.

(2) The terms "construction" and "constructing" mean the preparation of drawings and specifications for school facilities; erecting, building, acquiring, altering, remodeling, improving, or extending school facilities; and the inspection and supervision of the construction of school facilities.

(3) The term "school facilities" means classrooms and related facilities, and initial equipment, machinery, and utilities necessary or appropriate for school purposes; the term does not include (a) interests in land, (b) off-site improvements, (c) athletic stadia, (d) structures or facilities intended primarily for athletic exhibitions, contests, or games or other events for which admission is to be charged to the general public, or (e) structures or facilities designed to be used exclusively for special activities, such as single-purpose auditoriums or gymnasiums.

(4) The term "State" means a State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and the Canal Zone.

(5) The term "school agency" means a board of education or other regularly constituted local school authority having administrative control and direction of public schools in a county, township, independent, or other school district located within a State; and includes any State agency which directly operates and maintains public schools or which has responsibility for the provision of school facilities.

(6) The term "State agency" means the statewide public educational agency charged under State law with supervisory or other control functions over its system of schools or, if there is no such agency, any statewide educational agency within the State designated by or under State law, or in the absence thereof by the governor, to be the single State educational agency responsible for developing and submitting a State plan for approval under section 6 and for administering the approval plan; in the case of the Virgin Islands, the term "State agency" means the governor.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 4. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for the five succeeding fiscal years, such amounts as may be necessary to make payments to State agencies to accomplish the purpose of this Act.

ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

SEC. 5. (a) From the total funds appropriated for any fiscal year for making payments under this Act, the Commissioner shall allot to each State an amount which bears the same ratio to the total funds so appropriated as the school-age population of the State bears to the total of the school-age populations of all the States. As used in this subsection, the term "school-age population" means that part of the population which is between the ages of five and seventeen, both inclusive, as determined on the basis of the most recent estimates certified by the Secretary of Commerce.

(b) After the State plan has been approved under section 6, payments out of the State's allotment shall be made in accordance with section 7.

STATE PLANS

SEC. 6 (a) Any State which desires to accept the benefits of this Act shall submit to the Commissioner, through its State agency, a State plan which shall—

(1) designate the State agency through which the plan is submitted as the sole State agency responsible for administering the plan throughout the State;

(2) contain satisfactory evidence that the State agency will have authority to carry out the plan in conformity with this Act;

(3) set forth a program under which funds paid to the State under this Act will be expended solely for projects, to be approved by the State agency, for construction of school facilities for tax-supported elementary and secondary schools which are under public supervision and control;

(4) set forth principles for determining the relative priority of school facility construction projects, which shall take into account the relative financial resources of the several local school agencies in the State; the relative efforts which have been and are being made to meet their needs for school facilities out of State and local funds; and the relative urgency of their needs for school facilities, determined according to relative conditions of overcrowding or lack of facilities and relative extent to which unsafe and obsolete facilities are in use;

(5) provide for such fiscal control and fund-accounting procedures (for the State agency and for local school agencies undertaking approved projects) as may be necessary to assure proper disbursement and accounting for Federal funds paid to the State under this Act;

(6) provide an opportunity for a hearing before the State agency to each local school agency within the State which applies for approval of a construction project under this Act;

(7) provide for the establishment of standards on a State level for planning and constructing school facilities;

(8) provide that the State agency will make such reports to the Commissioner in such form and containing such information as is reasonably necessary to enable the Commissioner to perform his duties under this Act; and

(9) provide that all laborers and mechanics employed by contractors or subcontractors on construction work performed on school facilities projects approved under the plan shall be paid wages at rates not less than those prevailing on similar construction in the locality as determined by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the Davis-Bacon Act, as amended (40 U.S.C., secs. 276a–276a–5), and that every such employee shall receive compensation at a rate not less than one and one-half times his basic rate of pay for all hours worked in any workweek in excess of eight hours in any workday or 40 hours in the workweek, as the case may be. The Secretary of Labor shall have, with respect to the labor standards specified in paragraph (10), the authority and functions set forth in Reorganization Plan Numbered 14 of 1950 (15 F.R. 3176; 64 Stat. 1267), and section 2 of the Act of June 13, 1934, as amended (40 U.S.C. 276c).

(b) The Commissioner shall approve any State plan and any modification thereof which complies with the provisions of subsection (a), but shall not finally disapprove any State plan or modification thereof without first affording to the State agency reasonable notice and opportunity for a hearing.

(c) Whenever the Commissioner, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State agency, finds that—

(1) the State plan submitted through the agency and approved under this section has been so changed that it no longer complies with the provisions of subsection (a), or

(2) in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with any such provision, he shall make no further reservations under section 7(a) for projects in the State, and no further payments for any project designated by him as directly affected by such failure, until he is satisfied that there is no longer any such failure to comply, or, if compliance is impossible, until the State repays or arranges for the repayment of Federal funds which have been diverted or improperly expended. After notice as provided in this subsection to any State, the Commissioner may suspend further reservations of funds under section 7(a) for projects in the State, pending the making of findings under this subsection.

PAYMENTS TO STATES

SEC. 7. (a) Payments under this Act shall be made to those State agencies which administer plans approved under section 6 and which furnish statements to the Commissioner in accordance with this section. Each such statement shall set forth one or more projects approved by the State agency under the plan, the estimated cost of each such project, and the amount which the State agency desires to be paid for each project out of the State's allotment.

(b) Except as provided in section 8, the Commissioner shall issue, to each State agency furnishing a statement in accordance with subsection (a), a commitment reserving, out of the State's allotment, for each project included in the statement, the amount requested by the State agency for that project. The Commissioner shall change any amount so reserved upon request of the State agency and receipt of an amended statement from the State agency, but only to the extent the change is not inconsistent with the other provisions of this Act. The Commissioner shall pay the amount reserved to the State agency, through the disbursing facilities of the Department of the Treasury, at such times and in such installments (in advance of the incurring of cost or otherwise) as he may determine. Funds so paid shall be used exclusively to meet the cost of constructing the project for which the amount was reserved.

(c) If any project for which one or more payments have been made under this section is abandoned, or is not completed within a reasonable period determined under regulations of the Commissioner, the State to which such payments were made shall repay to the United States, for deposit in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts, the amount of such payments or such lesser amounts as the Commissioner deems reasonable.

MATCHING BY STATES AND LOCAL COMMUNITIES

SEC. 8. The Commissioner may issue or modify a commitment under section 7 only if the amount to be reserved under the commitment, plus any amounts paid or to be paid under other commitments previously issued under this Act to the same State agency for the same fiscal year, does not exceed one-half of the sum of (1) the cost of constructing the project in question and (2) the total cost of constructing the projects for which such other commitments have been issued.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

SEC. 9. (a) If any State is dissatisfied with the Commissioner's final action under section 6, such State may appeal to the United States district court for the district in which the capital of the State is located. The summons and notice of appeal may be served at any place in the United States. The Commissioner shall forthwith certify and file in the court the transcript of the proceedings and the record on which he based his action.

(b) The findings of fact by the Commissioner, unless substantially contrary to the weight of the evidence, shall be conclusive; but the court, for good cause shown, may remand the case to the Commissioner to take further evidence, and the Commissioner may thereupon make new or modified findings of fact and may modify his previous action, and shall certify to the court the transcript and record of the further proceedings. Such new or modified findings of fact shall likewise be conclusive unless substantially contrary to the weight of the evidence.

(c) The court shall have jurisdiction to affirm the action of the Commissioner or to set it aside, in whole or in part. The judgment of the court shall be subject to review by the appropriate United States court of appeals and the Supreme Court of the United States, as provided in sections 1291 and 1254 of title 28 of the United States Code.

ASSURANCE AGAINST FEDERAL INTERFERENCE IN SCHOOLS

SEC. 10. In the administration of this Act, no department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States shall exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the personnel, curriculum, or program of instruction of any school or school system of any school agency.

DELEGATION OF FUNCTIONS

SEC. 11. The Commissioner may delegate to any officer or employee of the Office of Education any of his functions under this Act except the making of regulations.

S. 1089

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "Educational Tax Credit Act of 1959."

SEC. 2. (a) Part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 39. TUITION AND FEES PAID BY INDIVIDUALS TO INSTITUTIONS OF HIGHER EDUCATION

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—There shall be allowed to an individual, as credit against the tax imposed by this subtitle for the taxable year, an amount equal to 30 percent of the aggregate amount paid during the taxable year by such individual to institutions of higher education as tuition or fees for the education of such individual or of any other individual at a level above the 12th grade.

"(b) LIMITATIONS.—

"(1) INDIVIDUAL RECEIVING EDUCATION MUST BE FULL-TIME STUDENT.—Amounts paid for the education of any individual which (but for this paragraph) would be taken into account under subsection (a) shall be taken into account only if such individual is a student (as defined in section 151(e)(4) for the calendar year in which the taxable year of the taxpayer begins.

"(2) ADJUSTMENT FOR SCHOLARSHIPS AND CERTAIN ALLOWANCES.—In the case of any individual who for any period receives—

"(A) any scholarship or fellowship grant (within the meaning of section 117(a)(1)) which, under section 117, is not includible in gross income, or

"(B) any education and training allowance under part IV of title II of the Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952, any amount paid for tuition or fees for such period which (but for this paragraph) would be taken into account under subsection (a) shall be taken into account only to the extent that the aggregate of such tuition and fees charged such individual for such period exceeds the sum of (i) an amount equal to all the scholarships and fellowship grants described in subparagraph (A) received by such individual for such period, plus (ii) an amount equal to 30 percent of all the allowances described in subparagraph (B) received by such individual for such period.

"(3) MAXIMUM YEARLY CREDIT WITH RESPECT TO EDUCATION OF ANY INDIVIDUAL NOT TO EXCEED $450.—In the case of any taxpayer, the credit allowed by this section for any taxable year, with respect to the education of any individual, shall not exceed $450.

"(4) CREDIT NOT TO CAUSE REFUND OF TAX.—The credit allowed by this section shall not exceed the amount of the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, reduced by the sum of the credits allowable under sections 33 (relating to foreign tax credit), 34 (relating to credit for dividends received by individuals), 35 (relating to partially tax-exempt interest), and 37 (relating to retirement income).

"(c) INSTITUTION OF HIGHER EDUCATION DEFINED.—For purposes of this section, the term 'institution of higher education' means only an educational institution—

"(1) which normally maintains a regular faculty and curriculum and normally has a regularly organized body of students in attendance at the place where its educational activities are carried on;

"(2) which regularly offers education at a level above the 12th grade; and

"(3) contributions to or for the use of which are deductible under section 170."

(b) The table of sections for such part IV is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Sec. 39. Tuition and fees paid by individuals to institutions of higher education."

SEC. 3. The amendments made by this act shall apply only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1959.

S. 1090

A bill to provide for assistance to and cooperation with States in strengthening and improving State and local programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Short title

SEC. 1. This Act may be cited as the "Delinquent Children's Act of 1959."

Findings and policies

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) juvenile delinquency, since it is a social disability that impedes the development of children into responsible citizens, thereby diminishes the strength and vitality of the Nation;

(2) juvenile delinquency is a steadily mounting problem of nationwide proportions in both our urban and rural communities, the problem overreaches local and even State boundaries in some of its aspects; State and local resources, especially in regard to the availability of specialized facilities and professional personnel trained to handle the problems of delinquency, are, in most cases, inadequate; and

(3) although major factors in juvenile delinquency are basically related to conditions in the home, the neighborhood, the community, and the State, requiring concerted and coordinated action on those fronts, the Federal Government can and should provide such leadership as is possible in stimulating home, neighborhood, community, and State efforts, and should undertake such measures as the neighborhoods, communities, local institutions, and States cannot initiate or support by themselves.

(b) It shall, therefore, be the national policy to provide such Federal leadership and such funds as may be required: to stimulate and promote the training of specialized personnel, and to supplement State and local resources for this and other purposes, and to encourage coordination and planning among public and voluntary nonprofit agencies including schools whose programs relate to the diminution, control, and treatment of juventile delinquency, especially those agencies concerned with the welfare, health (including mental health), spiritual development, education, and recreation of children and youth, and to assist the States in strengthening, improving, and encouraging State and community programs to diminish, control, and treat juvenile delinquency, both as specialized programs and as part of general State, community, and neighborhood programs related to the problem of juvenile delinquency.

TITLE I—ESTABLISHMENT OF FEDERAL ADVISORY COUNCIL ON JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

SEC. 101. In order to provide the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") with advice concerning programs for the prevention, diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, and to help carry out the purposes of this Act, there is hereby established in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a Federal Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency (hereinafter referred to as the "Council"). The Council shall consist of the Secretary or his designee, representing the Secretary, and twenty-one members appointed by the Secretary without regard to civil-service laws. The twenty-one members so appointed, none of whom shall be officers or full-time employees of the Federal Government, shall be eminent in fields related to juvenile delinquency such as education, law, child psychology, criminology, penology, sociology, psychiatry, social work, juvenile court work, probation and parole services, spiritual guidance, recreation work, police work, and community organization work and representatives of the public well known for leadership in programs concerned with juvenile delinquency. In making such appointments, the Secretary shall give due consideration to recommendations for such appointments submitted to him by private voluntary organizations and professional associations interested in and associated with the above fields, including, but not limited to, such organizations as the National Association of Social Workers, the American Public Welfare Association, the American Public Health Association, the Industrial Areas Foundation, the National Association of Training Schools and Juvenile Agencies, the Child Welfare League of America, the Family Service Association of America, the National Council of Juvenile Court Judges, the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the National Probation and Parole Association, the American Bar Association, the National Education Association, the American Association of School Administrators, the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, and the American Medical Association.

SEC. 102. The terms of each of the twenty-one appointed members of the Council shall be for four years, except that the first Council shall be appointed as follows: Seven members shall be appointed for sixteen months, seven members shall be appointed for thirty-two months, and seven members shall be appointed for four years. Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor is appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term.

SEC. 103. The Council shall, among other duties and functions, submit an annual report to the Secretary. The Council shall make such additional reports, from time to time, to the Secretary, as the Council shall deem necessary and appropriate, which reports, in the discretion of the Council, shall be of public record. Such reports shall deal with the status of the problem of juvenile delinquency, the progress being made with the problem, and shall contain such recommendations as the Council may deem appropriate with regard to any matter covered under this Act: Provided, That the Council's annual reports shall be submitted by the Secretary to the Congress, and the Secretary, in transmitting such reports, shall append such comments, especially with respect to recommendations contained therein, as he may deem appropriate: Provided further, That such of the Council's reports to the Secretary which the Council decides shall be of public record shall be made public by the Secretary, together with such comment by the Secretary as he may deem appropriate.

SEC. 104. The Council is authorized to comment upon applications for special projects submitted to the Secretary under title IV of this Act and to recommend to the Secretary for grants under such title any such projects or any projects proposed by the Council which show promise of making valuable contributions of the diminution, control, or treatment of juvenile delinquency. The Secretary is authorized to utilize the services of any member or members of the Council in connection with matters relating to this Act, for such periods, in addition to conference periods, as he may determine.

SEC. 105. Decisions by the Council in regard to reports or in regard to any other matters within its jurisdiction shall be by majority vote of all the members of the Council, except that the Secretary or his designee may not vote except in the case of a tie.

SEC. 106. Appointed members of the Council, while attending meetings of the Council or while otherwise serving at the request of the Secretary, shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate to be fixed by the Secretary, but not exceeding $50 per diem, and shall also be entitled to receive expenses while so serving away from their places of residence.

SEC. 107. The Council shall elect a chairman and a secretary who shall serve without additional compensation and the Council shall be provided by the Secretary with such technical, consultative, clerical, and other assistance as the Council shall require, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

TITLE II—GRANTS TO STATES TO STRENGTHEN AND IMPROVE PROGRAMS

SEC. 201. For the purpose of assisting the States to strengthen and improve State and local programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, the sum of $5,000,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, the sum of $7,500,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962, the sum of $10,000,000, and for each of the following four fiscal years such sums as the Congress may determine.

SEC. 202. The sums appropriated under section 201 shall be available for making grants to States to assist them to establish, strengthen, and improve, under approved State plans, programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency by—

(A) determining the most urgent needs of the State and localities for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency;

(B) developing a plan of priorities for meeting such needs in a coordinated and balanced manner;

(C) coordinating, on a continuing basis, the execution of such plans;

(D) providing either directly or through entering into contracts with private voluntary organizations demonstrations of improved services for the location, treatment, and aftercare of delinquent youth; and

(E) conducting either directly or through entering into contracts with private voluntary organizations research and investigations for assessing the causes and extent of juvenile delinquency and the effectiveness of existing programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, and for developing improved methods for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency.

SEC. 203. The Secretary shall approve any State plan for carrying out the purposes set forth in section 202 if he finds that such plan—

(A) designates a State agency which shall, either directly or through arrangements with other State or local agencies, carry out such purposes;

(B) shows that in developing such plan there has been consultation with and among representatives of State agencies concerned with juvenile delinquency, including to the extent feasible the State welfare, education, health, and labor departments, mental health and vocational rehabilitation authorities, the employment service, State and local agencies responsible for services to, or care of, delinquent youth, and private voluntary organizations engaged in or responsible for such services and persons representative of juvenile courts and probation and police services; and provides for the participation of such agencies, representatives, organizations, and persons in carrying out the purposes of section 202 and for coordination of public and voluntary services within the State dealing with juvenile delinquency in furtherance of the national policy as set forth in section 2 of this Act;

(C) provides for financial participation by the State;

(D) provides for the establishment of a State advisory council to advise the designated State agency on the administration of the program under this Act; such council to be representative of private voluntary organizations, professional associations, and civic groups interested in the problems of children and youth, especially juvenile delinquency;

(E) provides for a determination of the most urgent needs of the State for strengthening and improving its programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, for developing plans for strengthening and improving such programs, and for planning and initiating a program of training of specialized personnel for such programs:

(F) provides that the State agency designated to carry out such plan shall make such reports, in such form, and containing such information as the Secretary may from time to time reasonably require, and shall comply with such provisions as he may from time to time find necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports;

(G) provides for such methods of administration (including methods relating to the establishment and maintenance of personnel standards on a merit basis except that (A) the Secretary may, if he determines that this requirement is not feasible or would unduly delay the maximum effectiveness of a State plan, exempt portions of a State plan from this requirement and (B) the Secretary shall exercise no authority with respect to the selection, tenure of office and compensation of any individual employed in accordance with such methods) as are necessary for the proper and efficient operation of the plan; and

(H) makes a substantial contribution toward the fulfillment of the purposes set forth in section 2 of this Act.

SEC. 204. (a) From the sums made available in any fiscal year for grants to States under section 202, each State shall be entitled to an allotment of an amount which bears the same ratio to such sums as the child population of such State bears to the child population of all States. The allotment to any State under the preceding sentence for a fiscal year which is less than $50,000 shall be increased to that amount, the total of the increases thereby required being derived by proportionately reducing the allotments to each of the remaining States under the preceding sentence but with such adjustments as may be necessary to prevent the allotment of any such remaining States from being thereby reduced to less than $50,000.

(b) From each State's allotment under this section for any fiscal year the Secretary shall pay to such State an amount equal to its Federal share (as defined in section 507 (B)) of the cost of carrying out the purposes set forth in section 202 in accordance with its State plan approved under section 203: Provided, That, from each State's allotment for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1960, and June 30, 1961, the Secretary shall pay to such State an amount equal to 100 per centum of so much of the cost of carrying out the purposes set forth in section 202 as does not exceed $30,000 for the two years combined, and an amount equal to the Federal share (as defined in section 507(B)) of the cost of carrying out the purposes set forth in section 202 as exceeds $30,000.

(c) At such time or times of each fiscal year as the Secretary determines, after receiving advice from the States with respect thereto, that the amounts (if any) to be paid to any State from its initial allotment for such year will total less than such allotment, the Secretary shall reallot the portion of such initial allotment which he determines will not be so paid to such State. Such portion shall be available to other States which the Secretary determines have need in carrying out their State plans for amounts in excess of their initial allotment; such reallotment to be made on the basis of such State plans after taking into consideration the child population of each such State as compared with such population of all such States. Any amount so reallotted to a State shall be deemed part of its allotment under section 204 (b).

TITLE III—GRANTS FOR TRAINING PERSONNEL

SEC. 301. For the purpose of training personnel employed, or preparing for employment, in programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, the sum of $5 million and for each of the following 7 fiscal years such sums as the Congress may determine.

SEC. 302. The sums appropriated under this title shall be available for grants to States and to approved nonprofit institutions of higher learning for paying the cost of training personnel employed, or preparing for employment, in programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, or for the development of courses for such training, including the establishment and maintenance of such fellowships and traineeships, with such stipends and allowances (including travel and subsistence expenses) as the Secretary may determine to be necessary.

SEC. 303. Payments under this title may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement for services performed and purchases made as may be determined by the Secretary and shall be made on such conditions as the Secretary finds necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

TITLE IV—GRANTS FOR SPECIAL PROJECTS

SEC. 401. For the purpose of demonstrating or developing improved techniques and practices for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, the sum of $1 million, and for each of the following 6 fiscal years such sums as the Congress may determine.

SEC. 402. The sums appropriated under this title shall be available for grants to States and to public and private nonprofit institutions of higher learning or research for paying the costs of special projects carried out directly or through contracts with private voluntary organizations which, in the judgment of the Secretary, hold promise of making a substantial contribution to the strengthening or improvement of programs for the diminution, control, or treatment of juvenile delinquency. States may expend such sums as are made available under this title either directly or through the political subdivisions of the State. Any grant of funds under this title which will be used for direct services to delinquent children must have prior approval of the State agency supervising the administration of the State plan pursuant to title II of this Act.

SEC. 403. Payments under this title may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement for services performed and purchases made as may be determined by the Secretary, and shall be made on such conditions as the Secretary finds necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

TITLE V—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 501. In carrying out his duties under this Act, the Secretary shall—

(A) make such studies, investigations, demonstrations, and reports as will promote the strengthening of programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency;

(B) cooperate with and render technical assistance to States in matters relating to such programs;

(C) disseminate information as to the studies, investigations, demonstrations, and reports referred to in paragraph (A) hereof and as to other matters relating to such programs; and

(D) until June 30, 1961, provide short-term courses of training and instruction in technical matters relating to the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency, including the establishment and maintenance of such fellowships and traineeships, with such stipends and allowances (including travel and subsistence expenses), as he may deem necessary, except that no such training or instruction (or fellowship or scholarship) shall be provided any individual for any one course of study for a period in excess of one year.

SEC. 502. The Secretary is authorized to make regulations governing the administration of this Act.

SEC. 503. The Secretary shall include in his annual report a full report of the administration of this Act.

SEC. 504. There are hereby authorized to be included for each fiscal year in the appropriation for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare such sums as are necessary to administer this Act.

SEC. 505. The method of computing and paying amounts pursuant to section 204 shall be as follows:

(A) The Secretary shall, prior to the beginning of each calendar quarter or other period prescribed by him, estimate the amount to be paid to each State under the provisions of such section for such period, such estimate to be based on such records of the State body and information furnished by it, and such other investigation, as the Secretary may find necesary.

(B) The Secretary shall pay to the State, from the allotment available therefor, the amount so estimated by him for any period, reduced or increased, as the case may be, by any sum (not previously adjusted under this paragraph) by which he finds that his estimate of the amount to be paid to the State for any prior period under such section was greater or less than the amount which should have been paid to the State for such prior period under such section. Such payments shall be made through the disbursing facilities of the Treasury Department, in such installments as the Secretary may determine.

SEC. 506. (a) Whenever the Secretary, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearings to the State body supervising the administration of the State plan pursuant to title II finds (1) that the State plan or a specified portion of the State plan submitted and approved under section 203 has been so changed that it no longer complies with a provision required by section 203 to be included in the plan, or (2) that in the administration of the plan or a specified portion of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with such a provision, the Secretary shall notify the State body that no further payments will be made to the State under section 204(b) (or, in his discretion, that further payments will not be made to the State for portions of the State plan affected by such failure) until he is satisfied that there will no longer be such failure. Until he is so satisfied, the Secretary shall make no further payments to such State under section 204(b) (or shall limit payments to portions of the State plan in which there is no such failure).

(b) If any State is dissatisfied with the Secretary's action under subsection (a), such State may appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the circuit in which such State is located. The summons and notice of appeal may be served at any place in the United States. The findings of fact by the Secretary, unless substantially contrary to the weight of the evidence, shall be conclusive; but the court, for good cause shown, may remand the case to the Secretary to take further evidence, and the Secretary may thereupon make new or modified findings of fact and may modify his previous action. Such new or modified findings of fact shall likewise be conclusive unless substantially contrary to the weight of the evidence. The court shall have jurisdiction to affirm the action of the Secretary or to set it aside, in whole or in part. The judgment of the court shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in title 28, United States Code, section 1254.

SEC. 507. For the purposes of this Act—

(A) The term "State" includes Hawaii, the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, and Puerto Rico.

(B) (1) The "Federal share" for any State shall be 100 per centum less that percentage which bears the same ratio to 50 per centum as the per capita income of such State bears to the per capita income of the continental United States (excluding Alask), except that (A) the Federal share shall in no case be more than 66⅔ per centum or less than 33⅓ per centum, and (B) the Federal share for Hawaii and Alaska shall be 50 per centum, and for Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands shall be 66⅔ per centum.

(2) The "Federal shares" shall be promulgated by the Secretary between July 1 and September 30 of each odd-numbered year, on the basis of the average of the per capita incomes of the States and of the continental United States (excluding Alaska) for the three most recent consecutive years for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce. Such promulgation shall be conclusive for each of the two fiscal years in the period beginning July 1 next succeeding such promulgation.

(C) The term "child population" means the population under the age of twenty-one years, and the "population" and "child population" of the several States shall be determined on the basis of the latest figures furnished by the Department of Commerce.

(D) The term "programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency" shall include programs for the control and treatment of delinquent youth up to the age of twenty-one years.

SEC. 508. Not later than January 1, 1965, the Secretary shall transmit to the President for transmission to the Congress a report of the experience had by Federal, State, and local agencies in the administration of of this Act, together with his recommendations and the recommendations of the Council as to the expiration, continuance, or revision of the Act.

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF THE BLIND

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators BYRD of West Virginia, RANDOLPH, AIKEN, ALLOTT, BARTLETT, BIBLE, BRIDGES, CANNON, CARROLL, CLARK, COOPER, DOUGLAS, ENGLE, GREEN, GRUENING, HENNINGS, HUMPHREY, JACKSON, KEFAUVER, LANGER, LONG, MCCARTHY, MAGNUSON, MANSFIELD, MORSE, MOSS, NEUBERGER, PASTORE, PROXMIRE, SCOTT, SMATHERS, and YARBOROUGH, I introduce a bill to protect the right of blind persons to organize, to express themselves freely on matters affecting them, and to be considered in connection with programs aimed at solving their problems.

The bill contains two sections:

Section 1 directs the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, to the extent practical, to consult with blinded persons in the formulation and execution of programs for the blind and to encourage State agencies to do likewise.

The second section bars any officer or agency using Federal funds from exerting any influence on blinded persons with respect to their joining organizations of the blind.

Organizations of blind persons exist today in many cities and communities throughout the country. Some of these organizations are community groups, some are alumni groups, some are trade and professional groups, some are associations of vending-stand operators, some are organizations of workshop employees. These organizations have, in turn, formed statewide associations. Forty-five statewide associations of the blind are now federated into a nationwide organization.

Organizations of this kind have been formed by the blind to advance their welfare and common interests. These organizations provide our blind citizens with the opportunity for collective self-expression. Their members are thus able to express their views on the programs that our national Government and our State governments are adopting for their aid and rehabilitation. It is important that these views be heard and considered.

The bill does not prohibit other persons and organizations of either blinded or sighted individuals from exercising their right to be heard in these matters. The many difficult and important problems in this field need all the wisdom that can be made available if they are to be solved. The bill does, however, establish the right of the blind to be heard.

Unfortunately, there have been instances in which attachment to a particular philosophy of aid to the blind has unjustly discriminated against blinded persons or their organizations.

This bill would prohibit such discrimination.

I should like to make it clear that the bill does not involve a criticism of the many organizations for the blind who have over the years done such excellent work. Nor is it a criticism of the many State agencies, like the Massachusetts agency for the blind, that have been assiduous in seeking the advice of blinded persons in the formulation and execution of welfare programs for the blind. On the whole, workers and agencies for the blind have done an excellent job. This bill is designed simply to prevent the thoughtless, needless, and unjust rejection of the views of the blind and their organizations when policies vitally affecting them are formulated. It will result, I am confident, in better programs for the blind and a greater sense of participation by those whom these programs are designed to serve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1093) to protect the right of the blind to self-expression through organizations of the blind, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

INCREASED FUNDS FOR INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, by request, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Bretton Woods Agreement Act for the purpose of increasing the subscriptions of the United States to the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The proposed legislation would give effect to the message to Congress from the President of the United States urging prompt action to authorize the increased subscriptions.

Let me say that I am in sympathy with the general objectives of this bill. I attended the meeting of the Bank and Fund member countries at New Delhi, where these issues were explored, and I understand their importance with regard to U.S. leadership and the strength and security of the free world.

Nevertheless, on principle, I reserve my position on this bill, as well as on any suggested changes in it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Very considerable amounts of money are involved in this legislation, even though a relatively small percentage of the total subscriptions would take the form of withdrawals from the Treasury. The bill, therefore, should be of great interest to the American business community and to the public in general. Too often the interested executive agency is largely left on its own to justify needed legislation. In this case, the advantages will be extensive, and I hope that interested parties will make their views known as soon as possible. It is anticipated that hearings will be scheduled at an early date.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD, together with the message from the President of the United States to the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and message will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1094) to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, by request, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Bretton Woods Agreements Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 16. (a) The United States Governor of the Fund is authorized to request and consent to an increase of $1,375,000,000 in the quota of the United States under article III, section 2, of the Articles of Agreement of the Fund, as proposed in the Resolution of the Board of Governors of the Fund dated February 2, 1959.

"(b) The United States Governor of the Bank is authorized (1) to vote for increases in the capital stock of the Bank under article II, section 2, of the Articles of Agreement of the Bank, as recommended in the Resolution of the Board of Governors of the Bank dated February 2, 1959, and (2) if such increases become effective, to subscribe on behalf of the United States to 31,750 additional shares of stock under article II, section 3, of the Articles of Agreement of the Bank."

SEC. 2. Section 7(b) of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act is amended by striking out "of $950,000,000", and by striking out "not to exceed $4,125,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "such amounts as may be necessary".

The message from the President, presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT, is as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In the Bretton Woods Agreements Act of 1945 Congress authorized the participation of the United States in the International Monetary Fund and in the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

This act of leadership on the part of the Government of the United States made it possible to bring these two great international institutions into being and to launch a major effort among the nations of the free world designed to establish an effective and continuing system of international cooperation in the fields of monetary and exchange policy and economic development.

Since their foundation 12 years ago, the United States has given vigorous support to the Bank and the Fund.

The two institutions have been outstandingly successful.

The Bank has assisted on an increasing scale the economic growth of the less developed countries through well-conceived and intelligently executed developed projects. The Fund, through the provision of wise counsel and timely financial assistance to member countries faced with balance-of-payments difficulties, has successfully promoted the adoption of sound fiscal, monetary, and foreign exchange policies in member countries.

The international standing achieved by the Bank and Fund is such that the international economic system of today cannot successfully function without them. They are indeed vital to the continued economic growth and cohesion of the entire free world.

The National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, which is responsible for advising me with respect to United States relationships with the Bank and Fund, has now recommended that the resources of the Bank and Fund be increased.

I strongly concur in this recommendation. Accordingly, I ask that Congress, in accordance with the provisions of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, authorize the U.S. Governor of the International Monetary Fund to request and consent to an increase of 50 percent in the quota of the United States in the International Monetary Fund, and authorize the U.S. Governor of the International Bank to vote for an increase of 110 percent in the capital stock of the Bank, and, subject to said increase becoming effective, subscribe on behalf of the United States to 31,750 additional shares of stock of the Bank, amounting to a doubling of the United States subscription.

The recommended increase is necessary to enable the two institutions to continue to operate successfully over the years ahead. Our subscriptions are the only financial support we are required to give these institutions. Within the framework of their capital structure, they are self-supporting and do not require additional periodic contributions.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

The International Monetary Fund has two primary tasks. It promotes international monetary cooperation and sound foreign exchange practices which are vital to the balanced growth of world trade and development. It also provides short-term financial assistance to member countries to help them stabilize their currencies, maintain or move toward convertibility, and overcome temporary balance-of-payments problems without resorting to restrictions or other practices which may be harmful to international cooperation. In its financial operations, the Fund utilizes the gold and currencies which have been provided to it by the member countries on the basis of their quotas. These operations consist of advances or drawings repayable in not more than 3 to 5 years.

Since the beginning of its operations, the Fund has made available about $4.1 billion to 36 countries. Of this sum $3.2 billion was actually drawn in cash; commitments of over $800 million under standby arrangements or lines of credit are still outstanding; and $100 million in such credits were allowed to expire unused. Approximately two-thirds of the total was provided during the past 2 years, and the total amount of drawings and unused standby commitments outstanding on December 31, 1958, was $2.6 billion. On that date, the Fund's holdings of gold and U.S. dollars available for new advances or commitments were $1.4 billion, compared with $3.5 billion at the end of 1956. In the light of past experience, this amount would not be adequate if calls on the Fund comparable to those of recent years were made. The Fund must maintain sufficient liquid resources to constitute a second line of reserves to which its members can turn with assurance at any time.

The proposed general increase of 50 percent in the resources of the Fund, together with larger increases requested by a few countries, will meet this need. These increases will raise the resources of the Fund by approximately $5 billion, of which gold and dollars will amount to some $2.3 billion. If these new resources are made available, the free world can have full confidence in the capacity of the Fund to perform its tasks in the coming years.

Under the articles of agreements of the Fund, when a quota is increased, the member must pay 25 percent of the increase in gold, and the balance in its currency. In our case, this means a payment of approximately $344 million in gold and $1,031 million in dollars. The latter will be held in non-interest-bearing notes to be utilized only at such time as the Fund may need cash to meet drawings by its members.

I should like to stress the cooperative nature of this proposed increase in fund resources. Three-fourths of the gold to be paid to the Fund will come from other countries. Moreover, the additional holdings of other leading currencies will be increasingly useful to the Fund, particularly in view of the recent extension of the convertibility of major European currencies. This increase in resources on a very broad base is assured by the provision that the increase will not become effective until members having 75 percent of present Fund quotas have consented to quota increases.

INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development has, in its 12 years of operations, made loans of over $4 billion in 49 different countries and territories. The Bank's reconstruction loans were made in 1947, and since then the Bank has made loans of some $3.6 billion for productive development projects. Loans by the Bank are currently running at the rate of about $700 million per year. Most of these loans have been made to the underdeveloped areas of the world. The Bank's own financing and technical assistance activities have increased the pace of economic growth all over the free world. The Bank has also been able to act as a conduit and stimulant to the flow of private capital into less developed areas.

Under the charter of the International Bank, only a small part of its authorized capital is available for lending, and the Bank obtains its funds primarily through borrowings in the financial markets of the world. Most of its authorized capital is, in effect, a guarantee for these borrowings. The Bank has raised the equivalent of more than $2 billion through issuance of its bonds in several different currencies. Approximately $1.8 billion of such bonds are currently outstanding. These bonds are recognized throughout the world as high quality securities. Both because of the member countries' guarantees and because of the outstanding character of its record, the Bank has been able to borrow large sums of money at frequent intervals at rates of interest comparable to those on high-grade Government securities. This permits the Bank to fix interest rates on its own loans that do not impose undue burdens on the borrowing countries.

At present, and in the foreseeable future, the ability of the Bank to raise funds in the capital market of the United States will depend largely upon the guarantee inherent in this country's subscription. Under the current rate of Bank borrowing, the present amount of this guarantee will be exceeded in the next 2 years. If the Bank is to continue to play its full part in raising productivity and living standards, additional capital far beyond the amount covered by the existing U.S. subscription will be needed.

The proposed increase of 110 percent in the total capital of the bank and of 100 percent in the U.S. subscription will permit the bank to meet its needs for borrowed funds for a substantial period of time. No part of the increase in our subscription would be required to be paid in except to meet defaults on the bank's obligations. There is no reason to believe that this contingent liability will become a real one.

As in the case of the Fund, the proposed increase in the capital of the Bank will not become effective until subscriptions have been received for approximately 75 percent of the existing capital. This will assure a wide participation by the member countries.

The Special Report of the National Advisory Council, which describes in detail the proposal to increase the resources of the Bank and Fund, is attached.

The entire free world needs sound currencies and orderly exchange systems to foster trade and economic growth and it needs capital which will support rising living standards and accelerate the pace of economic development in all of the member countries. The International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development have achieved outstanding records as effective instruments toward these ends. For the well-being of the free world and in our own interest, it is essential that the proposed increases in the resources of these two institutions take place.

There is real urgency for prompt action. The United States has for many months been taking the lead in this important effort to equip the Bank and Fund to continue their work. The countries of the free world look to the United States, because of our economic strength, to set the pace by acting without delay to take up our subscription in the new stock of the Bank and to pay our quota increase in the Fund. I consider it to be most important for the U.S. Government to maintain the posture of leadership which it now occupies. To this end, I urge the Congress to enact the necessary legislation so that these increases may promptly be made effective, to insure further progress toward realizing a better life for the peoples of the free world.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 12, 1959.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes.

The amounts involved do not necessarily reflect the views of the sponsors. Although I have certain reservations concerning the space program as a whole, it is the wish of the committee to provide the National Aeronautics and Space Administration with supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1959 as expeditiously as possible to assure that there will be no delay in the program.

It is anticipated that hearings on this bill will be concluded fairly quickly and the committee can then continue its detailed examination of the programs proposed for fiscal year 1960.

The subcommittee to conduct the hearings is to be chaired by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS]; and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON] will be members on the majority side; while the Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] will be members from the minority side.

Upon conclusion of these further hearings, the committee will be in a position to recommend legislative action necessary to proceed with the space program in 1960.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration has informed me that the Vanguard weather satellite launched this morning has successfully gone into orbit.

The instrumentation has been tested and I am advised that it is working perfectly.

Even though this launching is late, it is a very gratifying step forward.

It opens the way to a peaceful and practical use of space for the benefit of all humanity.

Mr. President, I send the bill to the desk and ask for its appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1096) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for salaries and expenses, research and development, construction and equipment, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas (for himself and Mr. BRIDGES), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences.

AMENDMENT OF TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend section (9)(a) of the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended. The purpose of this measure is to facilitate transfer to private operation of certain vested alien property in the United States, notably the properties of the General Aniline & Film Corp., which has both corporate headquarters and plants in New York State. Representative ROBISON, of New York, has introduced a companion bill in the House.

Without in any way seeking to criticize the management of these plants during the period of Government operation, I feel it is obvious that the greatest contribution to the American free enterprise economy can be made by these plants under private operation, and that we can look for greater expansion and therefore more jobs when the return to private enterprise has been effected.

This matter has been delayed for many years. I feel the time for action is long overdue, and I hope that the Committee on the Judiciary will give early consideration to this measure and others to deal with this important problem.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1103) to amend section (9)(a) of the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 9(a) of the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That upon a determination made by the President, in time of war or during any national emergency declared by the President, that the interest and welfare of the United States require the sale of any property or interest or any part thereof claimed in any suit filed under this subsection and pending on or after the date of enactment of this proviso the Alien Property Custodian may sell such property or interest or part thereof, in conformity with law applicable to sales of property by him, at any time prior to the entry of final judgment in such suit. No such sale shall be made until thirty days have passed after the publication of notice in the Federal Register of the intention to sell. The proceeds of any such sale shall be deposited in a special account established in the Treasury, and shall be held in trust by the Secretary of the Treasury pending the entry of final judgment in such suit. Any recovery of any claimant in any such suit in respect of the property or interest or part thereof so sold shall be limited to the net proceeds of such sale, or, if more than one claimant, then to each claimant's proportionate share of the net proceeds of such sale, unless such claimant, within sixty days after receipt of notice of the amount of net proceeds of sale, or, if more than one claimant, then notice of the amount of claimant's asserted proportionate share of the net proceeds of sale, serves upon the Custodian and files with the court an election to waive all claims to the net proceeds and to claim just compensation instead. If the court finds that the claimant has established an interest, right, or title in any property in respect of which such an election has been served and filed, it shall proceed to determine the amount which will constitute just compensation for such interest, right, or title, and shall order payment to the claimant of the amount so determined. An order for the payment of just compensation hereunder shall be a judgment against the United States and shall be payable first from the net proceeds of the sale in an amount not to exceed the amount the claimant would have received had he elected to accept his proportionate part of the net proceeds of the sale and the balance, if any, shall be payable in the same manner as are judgments in cases arising under section 1346 of title 28, United States Code. The Alien Property Custodian shall, immediately upon the entry of final judgment, notify the Secretary of the Treasury of the determination by final judgment of the claimant's interest and right to the proportionate part of the net proceeds from the sale, and the final determination by judgment of the amount of just compensation in the event the claimant has elected to recover just compensation for the interest in the property he claimed."

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1959 AND COLLEGE FACILITIES ACT OF 1959

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, on Monday, February 9, I had to be absent from Washington and the Senate due to previous commitments in Massachusetts. In my absence the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] introduced for me the two bills which comprise the administration's program for assistance in school facilities construction, S. 1016 and S. 1017.

These bills will lie on the desk through Thursday of this week, February 19, for the benefit of all Senators who may wish to become cosponsors. The bills and explanatory summaries of their provisions, together with Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Flemming's letter to the Vice President, were printed in the RECORD of February 9 at pages 2084 to 2093. The same bills were introduced in the House by Representative FRELINGHUYSEN of New Jersey, H.R. 4267 and H.R. 4268. Senators interested in this important legislation will wish to read Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's clear explanation of H.R. 4268, which was printed in the RECORD of February 11 at pages 2190 to 2192.

Mr. President, all Senators should note that the administration's school facilities construction assistance program is contained in two separate bills. One provides a plan for higher education institutions—colleges and universities, S. 1017; the other contains a plan for elementary and secondary public schools, S. 1016.

Substantial assistance would be provided to needy school districts undertaking to build new elementary and secondary public school facilities. Colleges and universities would have assurance that they could finance the cost of new residential or academic facility construction needed to meet growing enrollments. If vigorous action is taken within the next 5 years by our school districts and States and colleges and universities, with the assistance provided in these plans, the shortage of facilities and the needs growing out of increased requirements can be met.

In my judgment we do not need to adopt a permanent massive Federal spending program to take care of shortages of facilities in American schools, colleges, and universities. The initiative and effort needed for the task are amply available at the traditional source of responsibility.

The shortage of educational facilities which we face today is, however, serious and in my judgment a proper subject for national concern.

The Federal Government should demonstrate its concern on behalf of all of our citizens and do so in a manner which will stimulate recognition of the urgency of the problem by school districts and States and colleges and universities throughout the country. The Federal Government should take action in such a way as to encourage action at the State and local level.

Any program of the Federal Government should operate to remove impediments to action which may exist in particular local situations which have decided to act.

Any program of the Federal Government should scrupulously avoid encroaching on State, local, and private responsibility for education.

Any program of the Federal Government should be tailored to meet the equally urgent need for sound Government fiscal policies. We must learn to keep the cost of activities of the Federal Government within its income.

The administration's program for assistance in the construction of educational facilities meets all of these tests. It will stimulate recognition of the urgency of the task our Nation faces in closing the classroom gap. It will operate to remove financial obstacles to local action. It will not establish Federal control over or interference with education. It will not open a budget gap which would excite the embers of deficit spending into flames of inflation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks editorials about the administration's educational facilities construction assistance program which were published recently in the Christian Science Monitor and the Baltimore Sun.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Feb. 11, 1959]

FOR SCHOOL BUILDING: SELECTIVE AID

The administration has come up with a new approach to the problem of the Nation's shortage of classrooms. Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Arthur S. Flemming has sent to Congress a program which certainly would bring very considerable aid in building to hardpressed school districts and which seems to avoid difficulties that have blocked endeavors in the past.

For the several years prior to the advent of sputnik the great national concern centered around the growing deficit in classrooms where the schooling of American youth must be carried on.

Four years ago, in 1955, the administration got before Congress a bill which would have extended $1.1 billion in Federal aid over a period of 3 years to help relieve this shortage. It was beaten in the House chiefly, it is thought, because it was accompanied by a rider which would have employed aid as a lever to press States and local communities into racial desegregation.

Two years later the administration almost won with a $1.2 billion program to be spread over 5 years. It was not hampered by devices to thrust it into the desegregation controversy. But there were fears that Federal control might follow Federal help and some feeling that States and communities should be expected to do more for themselves. And although the final bill included the President's means-and-effort test for allocating funds among the States, it was beaten largely by a 3-to-2 vote of his own party against it.

Then came sputnik, and the Nation became concerned more with the quality of schooling than with where it is to be given. The administration's excellent 1958 proposals, mostly enacted, omitted Federal aid to building entirely. Many, including this newspaper, asked whether overcrowded classrooms and double-session schools had vanished.

Now the administration has moved to correct the omission. It would extend help, in cooperation with the States, to school districts to float and retire bonds for the purpose of classroom construction. Each district would be expected to carry as much as it could of bond interest and repayment. The remainder would be undertaken, half and half, by the Federal Government and the State. Each year until the bonds were retired the district's ability to pay more or less of its share would be reviewed. (The formula for colleges would be somewhat different.) The Federal Government's total commitment would be for $2½ billion over 25 years.

On its face the program appears to have several merits: It would be tailored to the needs and resources of school districts (or colleges) case by case, and put the initiative up to each. It would require each State to share responsibility. And since construction of school buildings creates additions to the Nation's capital assets—thus, strictly speaking, is not expense—the program would enable the Federal Government to aid through the mechanism long accepted as adapted to capital additions—bond issues.

Granted that such a case-by-case approach might involve more administrative expense than some form of slice-it-up and pass-it-around. That expense would certainly be less than the waste through unjustifiable outlays implicit in the other. And there are moral values involved as well.

[From the Baltimore Sun, Feb. 10, 1959]

FEDERAL AID?

Spurred by the sputniks, the Eisenhower administration last year proposed what amounted to a special $1 billion program designed to boost national education over 4 years in such specific fields as science, foreign languages, and loans to needy students. The semipanic which then gripped the country produced congressional approval of a large part of the bill. Now the administration is proposing a $2,500 million program to extend over 25 years, but for a different purpose. It is to strike directly at the shortage estimated at 140,000 classrooms in primary and secondary schools and at similar shortages in schools and colleges.

In short, this is a straight-out construction bill, and Secretary Flemming, who presented it, declared himself "happy" with it for one specific reason. The Secretary quite accurately observed that Federal aid to construction is "an area where there has been a lot of planning and a lot of talk," but where "nothing has happened." He insists that "under these proposals something could happen." What could happen, if the proposals are passed, is that a three-way financial partnership would be produced between the Federal Government, the State governments, and the school localities to get school construction moving at a pace the Nation has never seen before.

It is too early to predict whether this bill can weather the obstacles which brought down earlier attempts at the same goal. And yet it is a safe bet that the same obstacles will still be there. They run from questions of desegregation to fears of Federal interference in State affairs, to charge that only the relatively poor States stand to benefit at the expense of the rich States. Indeed, there is already a rival Federal-aid bill eagerly promoted by some 30 Senators who aim at bringing up the question of teachers' salaries, too. From one of these, Senator MURRAY, the hostile comment is heard that the administration proposal is no more than a "banker's" bill, and that it envisions deficit financing which the administration "claims to abhor."

The best that can be said for this proposal is that—for the coming year, at least—its enactment will not affect the budget. Thereafter it will be a different story. What remains to be seen now is whether the sputnik outlook of last year remains in sufficient strength to get this proposal any further than a number of others which failed in the presputnik era.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I ask unanimous consent that I may be added as a cosponsor of the proposed legislation.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I most respectfully agree. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that the bills are now on the clerk's desk, and I shall be happy to have the Senator's name added as an additional cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

YOUTH CONSERVATION CORPS—DELETION OF NAME OF COSPONSOR OF A BILL

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I have been informed that, inadvertently, the name of the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] was listed as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 812) to establish a Youth Conservation Corps, which I had introduced on behalf of myself and several other Members of the Senate on January 29.

I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] therefore be deleted as a cosponsor of the measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. HART:

Resolution and statement dealing with Lithuanian Independence Day.

CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERSHIP OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON DEFENSE PRODUCTION—NOTICE OF MEETING

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, section 712 of the Defense Production Act of 1950, as amended, provides that the Joint Committee on Defense Production shall be composed of 10 members, 5 of them members of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, and 5 of them members of the House Committee on Banking and Currency. The law provides that these 5 members from each of the committees are to be appointed by the chairman of the respective committee, 3 from the majority and 2 from the minority party.

On January 29, 1959, the then chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], wrote me, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Defense Production, in part as follows:

The Senate Parliamentarian advises that the reappointment of Senate members of the Joint Committee is not necessary for their continued service on it from one Congress to another, assuming the members continue in the Senate and wish to continue as members of the Joint Committee.

This letter will serve as a formal notification to the Joint Committee that Senators ROBERTSON, SPARKMAN, FREAR, and CAPEHART wish to continue as members of the Joint Committee.

In addition, in accordance with section 712 of the Defense Production Act of 1950, as amended, I hereby appoint Senator BENNETT, as a member of the Joint Committee on Defense Production.

In order to eliminate any confusion as to the membership of the Joint Committee on Defense Production, I announce that the membership of the Joint Committee on the part of the Senate consists of the following Senators, in addition to myself: Senators SPARKMAN, FREAR, CAPEHART, and BENNETT. On the House side the following Members of the House Banking and Currency Committee have been appointed: Representatives BROWN, PATMAN, RAINS, MCDONOUGH, and HIESTAND.

I have called a meeting of the committee for next Thursday, February 19, at 3 p.m., when I intend to resign as chairman, to propose the election of the ranking majority Member from the House of Representatives, in accordance with the custom of alternating the chairmanship of the joint committee between the House and the Senate Members.

ADVANCEMENT TOWARD FOUR-POWER PARLEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the proposal by the United States, Britain, and France yesterday for a Big Four Foreign Ministers Conference, I hope, represents a forward step toward finding a reasonable and peaceful solution to the Berlin crises, German reunification, and related problems.

As we know, a time and place for the meeting have not yet been recommended. We read in the morning papers that high officials are converging on Washington right now.

We recognize that the continued division of Germany does, indeed, represent a danger to European security and to our peace.

Time after time, the Soviets have utilized the geographical arrangement of forces in Germany, particularly West Berlin, to foster crises—either as threats or forms of pressure upon the West.

We recognize that the holding of such a Four Power parley, if held, may make a constructive contribution toward resolution of the German problem. We must also realistically recognize that it may provide the Soviets with a line of retreat from their proposed unilateral action for abdicating responsibilities and obligations in regard to Berlin.

I request unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the text of the U.S. note delivered yesterday to the Soviet Minister of Foreign Affairs by the American Embassy in Moscow, indicating the willingness of the United States to participate in the Conference of the Foreign Ministers, along with the U.S.S.R., France, and the United Kingdom. In addition, I ask consent to have printed, along with the statement, a thoughtful editorial from today's New York Times, commenting on various facets of the proposal.

There being no objection, the note and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF U.S. NOTE

(Following is the text of a note delivered yesterday to the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs by the American Embassy in Moscow in reply to a Soviet note of January 10.)

The Government of the United States refers to the note of the government of the U.S.S.R. dated January 10, 1959.

The United States Government has repeatedly expressed its conviction that the continued division of Germany constitutes a danger to European security and to world peace. This danger is heightened by the persistent and flagrant denial to the East Germans of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The United States Government has sought to deal with this problem as urgently as possible through negotiations among the four powers responsible for Germany. In pursuing this objective, it has been willing to negotiate seriously on all aspects of the program. This attitude long held was most recently put forward by the United States in its notes of September 30 and December 31, 1958.

The Soviet Government has announced its intention unilaterally to abdicate certain of its internationally agreed responsibilities and obligations in regard to Berlin. That would encourage, and could result in, an attempt to assert control over the rights of the Western Powers to be in Berlin and to have unhampered access thereto. The danger to world peace inherent in this Soviet initiative is evident.

The position of the Western Powers in this matter has been made clear in their note of December 31. They have no choice but to declare again that they reserve the right to uphold by all appropriate means their communications with their sectors of Berlin.

Apart from the question of Berlin, the Soviet note of January 10 contains a number of statements and proposals with which the United States does not agree. The United States Government does not, however, propose to discuss these things in the present communication.

This is partly because its views on the points at issue have been made plain in the note of December 31, 1958, and on previous occasions; and partly because in its view neither polemics nor insistence on the prior acceptance of any limitations on the means of reaching satisfactory solutions can be helpful.

The United States Government is prepared to participate in a conference of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the U.S.S.R., France, the United Kingdom and the United States, and is ready to consider any suggestions as to a date and place, which would be fixed by mutual agreement. The place and date should be settled through diplomatic channels.

The conference should deal with the problem of Germany in all its aspects and implications as raised in the recent exchange of notes between the Governments of the United States of America, France, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany on the one hand and the Government of the U.S.S.R. on the other hand.

It is suggested that German advisers should be invited to the conference and should be consulted.

[From the New York Times]

THE WESTERN OFFER TO MOSCOW

As a first step toward averting the threatening crisis over Berlin and as a test of Soviet intentions the United States, Britain, France and West Germany have joined forces to propose to Soviet Russia an East-West Foreign Ministers Conference, with East and West German advisers present, to deal with the whole German problem.

To facilitate the conference without a prior dispute over the agenda, such as has prevented previous projects of the kind, the four Western Powers advance the broadest possible formula for it. They propose that the conference should deal with the problem of Germany "in all its aspects and implications," and without prior limitations on the means for a solution. This formula would include German reunification, of which the Berlin problem is a part, as well as European security and armament control, and all the plans for them.

In making this proposal the Western Powers firmly reject both the Soviet ultimatum on Berlin and the Soviet proposal of a 31 nation conference to write a peace treaty for a divided, neutralized and virtually disarmed Germany enjoined to limit political freedom for everybody except the Communists. In virtually identical notes which bear the imprint of Secretary Dulles but have been specifically endorsed by the whole North Atlantic Alliance, the four Western Powers again warn the Soviets that any attempt to put the Berlin ultimatum into effect by interfering with their rights in Berlin or their communications with it will be met "by all appropriate means"—which is diplomatic language for force. They further emphasize that the continued division of Germany, whose reunification the Soviets now refuse to discuss, constitutes a continuous danger to European security and world peace. And they denounce the "persistent and flagrant denial to the East Germans of human rights and fundamental freedoms."

But in making their proposal the Western Powers also offer Soviet Russia an escape from the trap of its own ultimatum. They leave the date and place of the proposed conference to further agreement. This permits the Soviets to accept the bid and engage in negotiations the start of which they have already designated as a possible reason for suspending the deadline of the ultimatum, now fixed at May 27. Even their insistence that German reunification depends on talks between West and East Germany is taken into account by the invitation to both East and West German advisers. And Western officials freely hold out the prospect that if a Foreign Ministers Conference is successful, a summit meeting of the heads of governments would probably follow.

All this is in line with the policy to which Secretary Dulles won the agreement of all our North Atlantic allies on his last European trip—the policy defined by the Adenauer-Dulles formula as "no concessions without counterconcessions" and by Vice President NIXON as "firmness in principle but flexibility in tactics." The latest Western notes make certain that this policy will prevail even during Mr. Dulles' illness.

CYPRUS—LIKE SUDDEN SUNSHINE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, amid the many domestic and world problems, it is always enheartening when solutions are forthcoming. We recall that, recently, one such ray of light broke through the dark clouds overhanging the strife-torn island of Cyprus in the eastern Mediterranean.

After a long, bloody struggle, a hope of peace suddenly brightened the outlook for 53,000 inhabitants; of whom four-fifths are of Greek origin and one-fifth are of Turkish origin. At long last, an agreement was reached for cessation of violence.

Among other things, the long-hoped-for agreement promises: First, independence for Cyprus, including provisions for a Government with a Greek Cypriote President and a Turkish Cypriote Vice-President, and safeguards to protect interests of people of both Greek and Turkish origin; second, Britain may retain bases on Cyprus; third, a single legislative chamber for governing the island—two-thirds of the seats would be allotted to the Greek community, and one-third to the Turkish community; and fourth, the independence of Cyprus, as well as security for Turkey against dangers from the island, would be sought through a treaty between Greece, Turkey, Cyprus, and, in all likelihood, Great Britain.

The world can rejoice with the people of Cyprus that, at long last, agreement to end the terrible fighting that has torn this island asunder may now cease.

Recently, an issue of the Christian Science Monitor carried an editorial entitled "Cyprus—Like Sudden Sunshine," reflecting on this step toward peace. I request unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CYPRUS—LIKE SUDDEN SUNSHINE

Like one of those unbelievable changes in the landscape that come with sunshine in the wake of a violent storm—such is the effect of the sudden prospect of peace in Cyprus.

The whole world had become accustomed to an almost constant battering of human sensibilities, with reports of terror, repression, murder, reprisals, riots, as Cypriote rebels fought against British rule for the right to self-determination and union with Greece. Britain held out against these demands both in the name of British and of Turkish Cypriote interests and as an expression of British determination to fulfill the responsibilities of a colonial power for keeping order in an area under its government.

And so the strife-ridden years passed, punctuated by efforts to negotiate a new constitution for Cyprus which would take account of the mixed population there (in which ethnic Greeks outnumber ethnic Turks by more than four to one). This week in Zurich the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers initialed an agreement which will, if approved by the British Government and the Cypriote people, set up a Cypriote republic.

The agreement was unexpected, but time has been playing its unseen part in this matter, giving attitudes all around a chance to change. Nearly 2 years ago Greek officials and Cypriote rebels were ready to settle short of their original demand for unfettered self-determination, which would have meant immediate union with Greece. As the Karamanlis government achieved some real economic gains for Greece it was possible for Athens to let the question of Greek-Cypriote union cool down at least to a point where self-government for Cyprus could come first and Greek union be postponed for some years.

But meanwhile the Turks had become excited about Cyprus to an extent that the British had not expected when London first opened the Pandora's Box of Turkish interest in a Cyprus settlement.

It would be possible to understand fully the present Greek and Turkish attitudes only by relating them to many crosscurrents of domestic politics as well as international interest. Perhaps indeed a Cyprus settlement has waited, as some other international agreements have, on the discovery of a formula which covers a heretofore unreconcilable difference between the parties.

In this case the needed formula was one which would give the Greeks and Greek Cypriotes a maximum present gain in their stalemated contest against British power, while satisfying Turks that this would not mean a loss of equality as between the Turkish and Greek communities and ultimate rule of Turks by Greeks on Cyprus, as would happen under Greek-Cypriote union. By giving veto power over foreign policy to representatives of the Greek and of the Turkish communities the present plan would insure Cypriote independence not only from Britain but from Greece and Turkey. This is the key to the new agreement. And it represents a big concession on the Greek side.

London is reported as hesitating over the question of approving it, but surely this can hardly be more than a pause for decorum's sake and to spell out details. The agreement seems acceptable to Cypriote leaders, including Archbishop Makarios, and London should need now only a lapse of time sufficient to prevent the authorship of the new plan from being attributed to British diplomacy.

LUNCHEON IN HONOR OF THE AUSTRIAN VICE CHANCELLOR, BRUNO PITTERMANN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last Tuesday I had the privilege of acting as host at a luncheon in the Foreign Relations Committee rooms in honor of Austria's Vice Chancellor, Bruno Pittermann. I and my colleagues also had the great pleasure of the company of Dr. Platzer, the very able and charming Austrian Ambassador; Dr. Fischer, First Secretary at the Austrian Embassy; and Dr. Scheu, a member of the press who is accompanying Mr. Pittermann.

I need not tell you what is already well known: that Dr. Pittermann is a fine gentleman and a good friend of the United States. Perhaps I also need not tell you that he has suffered imprisonment for his hatred of authoritarian rule in any form.

At home, Dr. Pittermann's leadership, tact, and moderation have done much to assure the continued smooth functioning of the effective coalition government. In the larger Western European framework, he has served as a Vice President in the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe, and he has played a considerable role in advancing the cause of European unity. In addition, he has been very active in the even broader sphere of Interparliamentary Union affairs.

In welcoming this statesman, we have also had an opportunity to display our feelings of friendship and respect for his people. Austria may be a small country, but it is outstanding in many ways, and particularly in terms of the intellect and warm-heartedness of its population. Few developments in our postwar world have been as notable as Austria's recovery of part of its territory from Soviet control; this was achieved in large measure through the courage, wisdom, and moderation of its leaders and its people. All of us in the free world can learn something from Austria's experience.

SOLUTION OF THE CYPRUS PROBLEM

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the free world is heartened to learn the news that our friendly allies, England, Greece, and Turkey, and the representatives of Cyprus, are close to a just solution of the Cyprus problem. As we all know, the island of Cyprus is in a most strategic position, and one that can be of great importance in world affairs. The solution of the Cyprus problem reestablishes the strong friendship of the people of Greece and the people of Turkey, who are the bulwark of defense in the eastern Mediterranean area and the gateway to the East.

Mr. President, for several years, I joined with my colleagues in the Senate in sponsoring a resolution in favor of self-determination for the people of Cyprus. The Foreign Relations Committee, of which I am a member, had this resolution before it and conferences were held in order to firm the American policy toward this serious international problem affecting three of our very strong allies, England, Greece, and Turkey.

Mr. President, on October 2, 1957, I had the privilege of sending a telegram to His Eminence Archbishop Makarios, archbishop and ethnarch of Cyprus, in which I stated:

As a cosponsor of a Senate resolution on the Cyprus issue, I sympathize with the grave issue that faces your people in Cyprus. It is hoped that America's three friendly allies, England, Greece, and Turkey, will arrive at a just and speedy solution to the issue of self-determination for Cyprus.

Mr. President, a just and speedy solution of this issue is being reached. It proves that there is no problem so knotty that friendly nations and reasonable people cannot resolve.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter sent by me to Dr. Nicholas D. Matsakis, on the occasion of a testimonial banquet in honor of Archbishop Makarios at St. Louis, be printed in the RECORD immediately at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 13, 1957.

Dr. NICHOLAS D. MATSAKIS,
Chairman of the Justice for Cyprus Committee, St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR DR. MATSAKIS: This is to acknowledge and thank you for your letter asking me, as one of the cosponsors of Senate resolutions in favor of self-determination of the people of Cyprus, to send a message on the occasion of a testimonial banquet honoring His Beatitude Archbishop Makarios.

It gives me great pleasure to submit to you this message in honor of Archbishop Makarios, who is presently touring the United States and appearing before the United Nations on behalf of self-determination for the people of Cyprus.

The United States of America has always been strongly against colonialism and has been a great advocate of the rights of people to determine for themselves their way of life and their form of government. In view of other messages that you shall receive, I shall conclude this concise statement with the hope that the American foreign policy of this matter will follow the long-established principle of anticolonialism and the right of self-determination and urge for an immediate and just solution to the Cyprus problem.

Please extend my warmest greetings to Archbishop Makarios and to the distinguished persons attending the testimonial dinner.

With every good wish, I am,
Sincerely,

——— ———.

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF THE ESTONIAN REPUBLIC

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on February 24, 1959, the Estonian Republic will commemorate its 41st anniversary. The Lithuanian and Latvian Republics also commemorate their anniversaries, the former on February 16 and the latter on November 18.

As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the U.S. Senate, as well from my experience as a U.S. Senator, I am well acquainted with the many injustices and hardships which the Soviet empire has perpetrated against Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania, as well as other peoples behind the Iron Curtain.

I know that all of the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives join me in an expression of hope for the peoples of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania and the other peoples who are behind the Iron Curtain.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter addressed to me by Mr. August Karsna, president of the Estonian National Committee in the United States, be printed at the conclusion of my remarks, and that a resolution passed by the Estonian, Latvian, and Lithuanian Councils, which is so expressive of the plight in which these people find themselves, be also printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ESTONIAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE IN THE UNITED STATES,
New York, N.Y., February 5, 1959.

The Honorable WILLIAM LANGER,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

SIR: On February 24, 1959, the Estonian Republic commemorates its 41st anniversary.

World War II which brought liberation of tyranny for many countries in Western Europe, provided Estonia and other Baltic countries with the well-known slavery of the Soviet Union.

Words are just not far reaching enough to describe all the misery and injustice the Soviet empire has caused against the Estonian Republic.

Regardless of all difficulties the Estonians all over the globe have never lost the hope to regain and achieve the freedom and independence for their dearly loved homeland once again. Their hope, in this respect, rests on the free world, especially on the United States of America.

Every reassurance on continuation for that hope of liberation would serve as a greatest moral support to this anti-Communist spirit of the captive Estonian nation.

All statements, messages and greetings on occasion of this great Estonian holiday will be broadcast to Estonians behind the Iron Curtain, published in the free Estonian press, and read at solemn commemorative meetings of Estonians in all continents.

The Estonian National Committee in the United States, spokesman for the Estonians in this country, has the honor of extending to you its deepest gratitude for the warm interest in the Estonian cause you have shown hitherto, and into the continuation of which we trust.

Very truly yours,

AUGUST KARSNA,
President.

RESOLUTION UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED BY THE ESTONIAN, LATVIAN, AND LITHUANIAN COUNCILS, PROTESTING THE ILLEGAL INCORPORATION OF THE BALTIC STATES BY THE RED ARMY INTO THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

Whereas as a result of the imperialistic illegal invasion by Soviet Russia, the Baltic Republic of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania were overrun by the Red army on June 16 and 17, 1940, and occupied by the Soviet forces against the will and desire of the Baltic Republics; and

Whereas the whole economic, social, and political life was destroyed, and religious life suppressed; and

Whereas the extermination of the people of the Baltic Republics began in June 1941, to assist Moscow's imperialistic plans; and

Whereas more than 100,000 people were arrested, tortured, slain, or deported to Siberian slave-labor camps within 3 days; and

Whereas the extermination of the Baltic nations, begun in 1941, has continued to the present day, more than 2 million inhabitants have been killed or deported; and

Whereas the entire population of the Baltic Republics will be liquidated if the annihilation practice by Soviet Russia is continued; and

Whereas this extermination of nations must cease: Therefore be it

Resolved, Soviet Russia's annihilation practice must be exposed and condemned by the free nations of the world through the forum of the United Nations. This will raise the hopes of Soviet Russia's enslaved peoples and effect prevention of further cruel extermination of the innocent; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge the Congress of the United States support the spirit of House Resolution 231, introduced by Mr. Kersten of Wisconsin, May 7, 1953, to create a select committee to conduct an investigation and study of the elections which were held in Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia in 1940, and other circumstances which led to the incorporation of those countries into the Soviet Union; and be it further

Resolved, We appeal to the President and Congress of the United States to support every measure which will bring about the liberation of the Baltic Republics: Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be submitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, Maryland Members of both Houses of Congress, the Governor of the State of Maryland, the United States representatives in the United Nations, the mayor of Baltimore, the diplomatic and consular representatives of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania in the United States and the press.

R. ISE,
Chairman, Estonian Committee.
IGORS BLOSFELDS,
Chairman, Latvian Committee.
ANTHONY J. MICEIKA,
Chairman, Lithuanian Committee.

SEVENTH ANNUAL NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I have received a letter from Dr. Anthony

Zukowsky, president of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, State Branch of North Dakota, advising me that on February 21, 22, 23, 1959, the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America will hold its Seventh Annual National Convention at the Statler Hotel, in Washington, D.C.

A large delegation of Americans of Ukrainian descent will journey to Washington and participate in the deliberation of this convention.

I have had the privilege on a number of occasions of speaking on the floor of the Senate on matters pertaining to the Ukrainian people and their many hardships in their native land.

History has recorded the great struggle of the Ukrainian people for independence, first from the Russian Empire, and then from the Soviet Union. The struggle has aroused world opinion against the Soviet communism policies of quelling Ukrainian resistance to Soviet Russian national enslavement of the Ukrainian people.

The Communist Russia-enforced famine in 1932–33, attempting to break the peasant's opposition to the idea of collective farms, coupled with the attempt to destroy the Ukrainian way of life by forcing thousands of men and women into Soviet labor camps and deporting them to remote frontier areas of Russia, are just a few of the atrocities committed by the Soviet Russians against the Ukrainian people to break their will.

It is noble indeed for the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America to carry out its constructive programs in this country, not only to aid the great cause of freedom in the Ukraine, but also to aid in so many worthy causes and projects in this great country of ours.

I wish the officers and delegates to the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America at its national convention great success in their deliberations and hope they will have a most enjoyable stay in the Nation's Capital.

PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICE BETWEEN SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., AND PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I was one of the strong and fervent supporters during 1958 of the Smathers bill, which was designed to strengthen the railroad industry.

However, the railroad industry will be making a mistake if it abandons virtually all its passenger services, which furnish the only avenue for effective contacts between the American public and American railroads.

I desire to invite to the attention of the Senate a letter of protest which I have sent to the Interstate Commerce Commission hearings concerning reduction of service by the Shasta Daylight streamlined passenger train between the San Francisco Bay area and Portland, Oreg., in my State. I ask unanimous consent that this letter be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS,
February 2, 1959.

Hon. PAUL C. ALBUS,
Interstate Commerce Commission Examiner, New Mint Building, San Francisco, Calif.

DEAR MR. ALBUS: I am writing this letter to protest curtailment of the daily Shasta Daylight schedule between San Francisco and Portland to three round trips a week.

This letter is written by a Senator who has been sympathetic with the financial plight of many of the railroads. I was an active backer of the Smathers bill, with its relief for the railroads in the form of Government loans, greater flexibility in rate structures, and similar reforms. I also was one of the most active sponsors of repeal of the 3-percent Federal freight tax, which frequently was placing the railroads at an unfair disadvantage in competing with contract haulers who did not come under the scope of this levy.

I provide you with this background to indicate that my protest over reduction of the Daylight's schedule is not because of any hostility to the railroad industry—far from it. I believe the railroads confront a difficult problem concerning competition and a declining portion of intercity freight and passenger revenues, and I want to help them solve that problem within the framework of what is fair.

Yet it is my considered opinion that the Southern Pacific has not done all that it could to promote passenger travel between the Pacific Northwest and the populous bay area by train. For example, the Southern Pacific today has no street-level ticket office in Portland, principal northern terminus of the Daylight's operation. Patrons must go to the sixth floor of an office building to purchase tickets, certainly a circumstance to discourage widespread passenger patronage. By contrast, the Union Pacific, Great Northern, and Northern Pacific all maintain ground-level passenger ticket offices on busy Portland downtown streets.

It is significant that the Southern Pacific, which has abandoned its street-level ticket-selling facilities in Portland, has substantially larger gross and net operating revenues than the other three railroads which I have mentioned.

For example, this is the total gross income nationally of the four lines in question during the first 9 months of 1958, segregated into freight and passenger categories:

	Freight	Passenger
Southern Pacific	$336,302,000	$22,007,000
Union Pacific	318,783,000	21,595,000
Great Northern	162,467,000	7,584,000
Northern Pacific	117,476,000	4,628,000

Source: Railway Age magazine.

I should also like to list for your attention the net operating income for these four railroads during the first 9 months of 1958 and a comparable period during 1957:

Total net operating income [1] for 4 major railroads serving Oregon, 1st 9 months of year

	1958	1957
Southern Pacific	$34,686,000	$34,106,000
Union Pacific	28,167,000	27,700,000
Great Northern	15,812,000	18,943,000
Northern Pacific	23,742,000	26,961,000

[1] Before interest and rentals.

Source: Railway Age magazine.

You will note, Mr. Examiner, that the Southern Pacific leads the other three systems in all the categories which are herewith enumerated. Yet it is the Southern Pacific which has curtailed and abandoned its groundfloor ticket-selling accommodations in Portland, whereas the other three railroads have continued their facilities of this kind. Certainly the operating revenues of the "Shasta Daylight" have not been enhanced by the fact that passengers must ascend six floors in an office building, in order to purchase their tickets in the business district of the city which is the "Daylight's" northern terminus.

Furthermore, while revenue figures are not broken down by States, it is significant that the Southern Pacific serves the principal timber-growing areas of Oregon, which is the Nation's No. 1 State in the production of lumber. Thus the Southern Pacific taps the cream of Oregon's lumber-producing counties from the standpoint of extensive freight tonnage; yet it is now proposing to reduce to three times a week the operation of one of its two passenger trains between Oregon and the population centers of northern California.

It does seem to me that a railroad enjoying a valuable and profitable freight business in a particular State does have certain public-service obligations with respect to passenger facilities and accommodations. I believe the Southern Pacific should discharge these obligations by continuing to maintain daily passenger service between Portland and San Francisco, both with its overnight Cascade and the daytime Shasta Daylight.

According to information provided to me by the Interstate Commerce Commission, Southern Pacific's net income for the first 11 months of 1958 aggregated $40,175,799, compared with $36,925,952 in the like period of 1957. This certainly does not indicate justification for curtailing service on account of any adverse earnings situation.

Furthermore, I think the Southern Pacific might well emulate the progressive attitude of several other western railroads, in reducing passenger fares recently as a move to attract additional business.

On January 28 the Rock Island system reduced its roundtrip fares on some trains by as much as 28 percent. On February 25, the Union Pacific and the Milwaukee Road plan a large reduction in passenger fares between Chicago and Denver. Furthermore, the Burlington Lines and the Missouri-Kansas-Texas Railroad have announced that they will meet the Rock Island reduction in areas where they are competitive with Rock Island passenger trains.

Certainly when lines like the Rock Island and Union Pacific and Milwaukee, with substantially lower gross and net revenues than the Southern Pacific, can stimulate patronage by lowering rates for travel on passenger trains, it is reasonable that the Interstate Commerce Commission should suggest the Southern Pacific seriously consider doing likewise.

In fairness to the Southern Pacific, I want to emphasize that both the Cascade and Daylight are excellent trains. Mrs. Neuberger and I have traveled aboard both of them, not only to California but between local stops in Oregon. They offer fine, modern equipment and first-rate dining-car service. Their crews are courteous, efficient and well-trained. I have no complaints to voice regarding the equipment, rolling stock or personnel. It is my hope that the Interstate Commerce Commission will require that the Shasta Daylight be operated on a daily basis, rather than being diminished in service to three round trips weekly.

As one of the U.S. Senators who requested this hearing, let me express my appreciation for an opportunity to have this letter from me entered into the official hearing record. It has been provided for you at the request of many hundreds of my constituents, who feel that reduced passenger-train service between two great population centers like Portland and San Francisco would represent a backward step in the economic and transportation development of the Pacific seaboard, which is one of the fastest-growing sections of the Nation.

With good wishes, I am,

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senator.

Mr. NEUBERGER. In addition, Mr. President, I think Members of the Senate should read a very strong and forthright editorial which was published in the Portland Oregonian of February 10, 1959. This editorial strongly reinforces my letter of protest to the ICC hearing. Like myself, the editors of the Oregonian have been sympathetic to many of the financial and economic difficulties of the railroad industry. However, Mr. President, the Southern Pacific Railroad does not even now maintain a ground-floor ticket office in Portland, Oreg., its principal terminus in the Pacific Northwest. If this is not designed to discourage passenger travel, what is its purpose? My letter to the ICC hearing has emphasized the fact that the net income of the Southern Pacific for the first 11 months of 1958 was substantially higher—some $3,100,000 higher—than during a comparable period of 1957. The editorial of the Oregonian emphasizes similar matters.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the Oregonian entitled "Firm Policy Needed" be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point for the information of my colleagues, who share my concern over an adequate and proper service to passenger travelers by American railroads in general and by the Southern Pacific in particular.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIRM POLICY NEEDED

Two months ago the Southern Pacific Railroad announced a decision to run its Shasta Daylight train three times a week, rather than daily, between Portland and San Francisco during the slack winter travel season. Senators THOMAS H. KUCHEL of California and RICHARD L. NEUBERGER of Oregon protested to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the railroad was ordered to keep the Daylight rolling 7 days a week pending the outcome of a hearing to open today at San Francisco.

The Espee argues that the Shasta Daylight doesn't carry enough passengers this time of year to make daily operations profitable, and sound business practice requires a cutback in service. It is implied the railroad is the helpless victim of a growing preference among travelers for cars, buses, and airplanes.

Senator NEUBERGER, however, raises the question of whether the railroad really is trying with all vigor and sincerity to retain and build up its passenger volume. Elsewhere on this page appear excerpts from his letter to Paul C. Albus, ICC examiner who will conduct the hearing. The Senator points out the recent abandonment of the Southern Pacific's ground floor ticket office at SW Sixth Avenue and Yamhill Street. This space, ironically, has now been taken over by Western Airlines, which is delighted at any opportunity to persuade rail travelers they should go to California by air.

Senator NEUBERGER is one of the best friends U.S. railroads have in public life. In his speeches and writings, both before and after his election to the Senate, he has stressed the importance of rail transport to the Nation. He has fought hard for more enlightened Federal policy toward railroads, to ease the squeeze they are in between Government regulation on one hand and stiff competition from rival carriers on the other. This background makes his criticism of the Southern Pacific in this instance of more than casual significance.

In words and actions, Espee officials have created the impression they see little future for rail passenger service, and might even welcome its demise so they could concentrate on freight haul. If only the interests of their stockholders were to be considered, this might be a wise corporate policy. But a common carrier, land grant railroad has been considered to have an overriding obligation to the whole public.

How far does this obligation extend? Must a railroad try its best, with ground floor ticket offices and advertising and promotion campaigns, to prevent passengers from going over to rival forms of transport? Or is it doing enough simply to provide enough locomotives and cars to carry the people who insist on riding on trains?

This question obviously has deep philosophic and economic aspects. It has been raised before, locally in the disputes over Oregon city interurban trolley cars and the Espee's passenger train to Ashland. But judges and politicians have so fogged up the issues in those cases that no clear answer can be expected. A firm answer is needed, so both the public and the railroads will know where they stand in the future. The ICC can use the Shasta Daylight case to establish a clear, fair policy on rail passenger traffic.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I also desire to express the gratitude of my constituents in Oregon to the distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] for his joining with me in protesting to the ICC over the proposed diminution in service by the Shasta Daylight between San Francisco and the Pacific Northwest.

The editorial of the Oregonian emphasizes, as do I in my letter to the ICC examiner, that the Union Pacific and Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railways all maintain and operate attractive street-level ticket offices on busy Portland downtown streets. The Southern Pacific has abandoned such facilities. Yet the Southern Pacific enjoys the largest net and gross revenues of these four railroads. I feel that all rail systems serving the Pacific Northwest have a real stake in using their influence on the Southern Pacific to do its share in providing the public with adequate and efficient passenger accommodations. I trust that the Southern Pacific itself will come to see the wisdom of such a course—that it is in the best interests of the prosperity of the American railroad industry as a whole.

If our great railroads desert their potential passengers, they will find they have declined substantially in public esteem, support, and understanding for railroad problems in general. I say this in all candor.

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, as we mark this year the sesquicentennial anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln our hearts and our minds harken to the words of his address at Gettysburg when he said that we "dedicate ourselves to a new birth of freedom." There are still those peoples, however, who must look to the future, rather than the past, to dedicate themselves to such "a new birth of freedom." These are the peoples living in the nations still held in thralldom by the Communist empire.

February 16 marks the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence. This tiny Republic, the southernmost of the three Baltic States, was occupied by the Soviets in 1939 during the short-lived Berlin-Moscow entente and annexed outright in 1939. The United States has properly not recognized this annexation.

This day our thoughts turn to the some 3 million Lithuanians who have not forgotten their national freedom, who yearn to achieve the individual freedoms which we take as a matter of daily course. Those Americans who commemorate the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence are performing a dual service—they keep fresh in the memory of all a small country whose liberty was forfeited through agreement between Nazi and Communist totalitarian powers and they remind the world, too, that Lithuanian independence is a real expectation for the future—not just a historic—memory of the past.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, February 16, 1918, Lithuania declared her independence. The illegal seizure of the Baltic States by Russia in June 1940, and the taking over of Lithuania's territory and institutions, was one of the most flagrant examples of complete disregard of the treaties of peace, friendship, and nonaggression that we have witnessed in our time. I am proud that my country has steadfastly refused to recognize the Soviet usurpation of the sovereignty of Lithuania.

But such acts of brutal aggression and disregard for international law and commitments can never dull the desire for freedom in the hearts of men. Despite the suffering and tribulations of that once independent country, the Lithuanian spirit is as undaunted and untrammeled as ever.

It is the fervent hope of free men everywhere that the day is not too distant when Lithuania can celebrate her Independence Day as an independent nation.

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, we who proudly claim our citizenship in the United States have one particular date which we celebrate perhaps more joyfully and vigorously than others. That day is the 4th of July, U.S. Independence Day.

When the last fireworks have been exploded, and the last marcher in the parade has passed, we still thrill to what that day means to us and to the rest of the free world. It marks really only one fact—the establishment of the first effective democracy in the history of the world.

Yet other days should have almost equal significance for us. And one of these days is February 16. That date marks the proclamation, in 1918, of Lithuanian independence.

But the appalling fact is that there will be no fireworks nor parades in Lithuania on February 16, 1959. It will be celebrated by Lithuanians, however.

For those living in this tiny nation, celebration will consist in murmured greetings to friends; in secret gatherings of patriots; and in prayers for the long-awaited renewal of freedom.

For those of Lithuanian birth and descent, living in the United States, celebration will consist in renewed efforts to bring about the kind of world in which all nations, great and small, can choose their own form of government as Lithuania tried to do so vigorously in 1918.

There will be no festivities on February 16 in Lithuania because of tyranny. Not tyranny of the kind which the United States overthrew, that of an overbearing mother country. It is tyranny of a far worse kind—that of a conquering foreign power.

Freedom was lost to Lithuania in June of 1940, lost to the invading armies of a mighty Soviet Russia. Emboldened by the license given them to carve up Europe with Hitler, as a result of the Soviet-Nazi pact, Russia swept into the defenseless Baltic States.

Lithuania's newly written song of freedom was stilled, but only within earshot of the Soviet conquerors.

It still resounds in my State, Mr. President. We in Michigan have been fortunate to have so many citizens of Lithuanian birth and descent to share our tasks and triumphs.

During my years in public life, I have come to know many Michigan citizens who proudly proclaim their Lithuanian heritage. Their hopes and prayers for Lithuania are only surpassed by their hopes and prayers for the United States.

I know that I speak for each and every citizen of Michigan when I say that February 16 is a day of significance for all of us. Freedom, even though not enjoyed by the majority of mankind, is nevertheless the existence for which man was intended and for which he has always struggled.

We are confident that Lithuania, which has so vigorously sought freedom, will achieve it again. The goal of the United States cannot be less.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish to join with other legislators who have noted that February 16, 1918, was Independence Day for Lithuania. This nation on the Baltic became, in 1940, one of the lands occupied by Soviet Russia.

We must, on anniversaries of this kind, remember that the desire for liberty dies hard. Decades cannot kill it; neither can the centuries. We in this Nation know that our friends in Lithuania feel as deeply about their right to independence as we do to ours. I would like to quote from a letter written by the Committee for the Celebration of the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence:

On the occasion of the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day on February 16, 1959, may we reiterate our conviction and that of freedom-loving peoples that Lithuania, like all nations, has a God-given right to be free. No one may deprive her or any nation of that right. Yet Russia has done just that to Lithuania. She, therefore, must be condemned and must be forced to leave Lithuania at once and make provisions for the return to Lithuania of all her people, now exiled in Siberia and elsewhere.

JOB RIGHTS AND PROTECTION OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to salute courage when I see it exhibited on a matter of principle. Mr. Joseph J. King, a former resident of Portland, Oreg., now living in Bremerton, Wash., is a dedicated career civil servant who, in my judgment, has taken a step which called for a great deal of courage.

As a personnel officer he protested a decision made by the Navy Department which he believed, in good conscience, to be an interpretation contrary to the spirit of the veterans preference laws. In so doing he hazarded his own position and was released.

Those of his colleagues who have watched him in his work with the Farm Security Administration, the Portland Federal Personnel Council, and the American Society for Public Administration, in which he held the position of vice president, knew that, given his personality and convictions, he could do no other.

That the principle he was urging of fair play in Federal personnel procedures is important is demonstrated by the fact that the Board of Appeals and Review of the Civil Service Commission has had the case under study for the last half year.

Mr. President, I commend to the attention of my colleagues, especially those who serve on the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service an article which appeared in the Evening Star of February 13, which discusses the case, and I ask unanimous consent that the article appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIGNIFICANT RULING IN JOB RIGHTS NEAR

(By Joseph Young)

One of the most important cases in recent civil service history, involving the job rights and protection of Federal employees, is due to be decided soon by the Civil Service Commission's Board of Appeals and Review. It is the so-called King case, involving a Navy civilian employee.

The issues involved are twofold:

First, whether a Federal agency has the right to make slight changes in an employee's position description in order to declare the position a new job, and make the employee take an open competitive exam to see whether he can stay on the job. This is often done by agencies to remove the employee and put someone else in his place.

Second, whether in a reduction-in-force program, veterans have a right to be assigned to job vacancies that are available at the time. It also, of course, would apply to nonveterans' rights to fill vacancies, although veterans would be more involved because of their greater retention rights.

At present veterans have the right to bump nonveterans in reductions-in-force programs, but they cannot fill any job vacancies that are open. Consequently, although a veteran may be perfectly qualified to fill a job vacancy at his present grade, he only has the right to bump another employee, frequently at a lower grade, or even lose his employment entirely. Then the agency is free to fill the vacancy as it pleases.

Veterans declare that the implications of this aspect of the King case are tremendous. It means that, under existing CSC rules, a Federal agency can circumvent veterans retention rights by manipulating the filling of vacancies, so that a veteran can be separated without any other job to go to or assigned to a much lower salary grade.

The CSC's Board of Appeals and Review has had the case under advisement since July, a tipoff to the case's importance. It is expected to hand down a decision soon. The decision could revolutionize Government job rights and retention procedures.

The test case involves Joe J. King, who was the civilian personnel officer, grade 13, at the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard at Bremerton, Wash. Mr. King, a veteran, got along fine with the various Government employee union organizations which are strongly backing him in this case. But before long there were reports that he had antagonized some of the Navy brass and that he would be removed.

Subsequently Mr. King was notified that there were some changes being made in his job description and that he would have to take an open exam to see if he could keep the job he already had. Navy then selected someone else to replace him.

At the time Mr. King was being fired, there was a vacancy open for a training superintendent, also grade 13, for which he felt he was eminently qualified, since it had been under his direct supervision for the previous few years. Navy refused to reassign him to this job but instead offered to bump him into a lower grade job occupied by a nonveteran. Mr. King refused and was left jobless. He now has appealed to the CSC, meanwhile, taking a position in industry.

The case has raised a furore throughout the Navy Department and in the Civil Service Commission as well. Both of Washington State's Senators, JACKSON and MAGNUSON, Democrats, are aiding Mr. King in his fight. So is the American Federation of Government Employees, of which he was a member.

ALLIED UNITY IN BERLIN

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on Sunday, November 23, 1958, it was my privilege to visit the city of Berlin.

I conferred during what were then the opening stages of the latest Berlin crisis with governing Mayor Willy Brandt, with Gen. Barksdale Hamlett, commanding general of Allied Forces in the free city, and with leading State Department officials.

I came directly to Berlin from Geneva, where I had been present as a Senate observer at the talks on nuclear test suspension.

The city of Berlin had not been on my original itinerary at the time I left Paris for Geneva, after my work at a conference of UNESCO.

But, once I saw the crisis developing, I was determined to learn about it first-hand in Berlin. I wanted, too, the people of Berlin to know by a Senator of the United States being in their very midst that our country is united on behalf of maintaining Berlin's freedom. That means maintaining uninterrupted access to this great bastion of freedom inside the Iron Curtain.

MEMORIES OF BERLIN

My day in Berlin represented one of the unforgettable highlights of my trip. I recall, for example, participating with Mayor Brandt at ceremonies at Templehof Airdrome, in front of the monument, commemorating the historic Luftbrücke or airlift 10 years earlier. Before hushed throngs of citizens, Mayor Brandt spoke movingly of the immortal deeds of American, British, and German heroes who, 24 hours a day, had kept open the lifeline to the encircled city. Earlier we had visited the sector boundary at Brandenburg Gate, where Mayor Brandt and I both spoke on the symbolism of German freedom in the eyes of the world.

My Sunday visit coincided with what is known in Germany as "Totensonntag," the day when memorial services honor the departed at cemeteries throughout Germany. On this hallowed day, the people of free Berlin were both reverent with respect to the deceased and determined more than ever to uphold the highest ideals of human freedom for which uncounted numbers of individuals have perished throughout history.

MY STATEMENTS TO THE PRESS

After leaving Berlin, I proceeded to Scandinavia — touring Copenhagen, Stockholm, and Helsinki, on the subject of medical research cooperation—which was the principal purpose of this phase of my trip.

Less than a week later, on November 28, 1958, I flew to Moscow from Helsinki.

Before leaving, however, I spoke to the press of Finland emphasizing once again Allied unity on the issue of the continued freedom of Berlin.

In Helsinki, moreover, I had received a cabled invitation from the Hearst headline service, inviting my reactions on the subject of the future of Berlin. Accordingly, I sent an article from Helsinki to the Hearst newspapers in order to make crystal clear not only to our own people, but to the leaders of the Soviet Union, whom I was to see very shortly thereafter, that America remains united on this question.

Thus, by both my presence in Berlin and by my comments to the American and foreign press, I sought to make unmistakably clear this fact to the Kremlin. While there are honest differences of opinion in the United States on certain phases of the German question, there is no division of opinion that free Berlin will not be abandoned by the West.

Since November 23, much has happened on the German question.

In order, however, that the full facts may be available for the record, I send to the desk now the text of the article entitled "Berlin Must Remain Free," which I had the privilege of writing for the Hearst headline service on November 28, 1958. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BERLIN MUST REMAIN FREE

(By Hon. HUBERT HUMPHREY)

The crisis of Berlin is the No. 1 challenge to the West. Here we see the strength, the purpose, the fidelity of the West under supreme test.

Storm clouds are gathering fast. You may expect trouble and lots of it from international communism's designs against this history-making city.

Two million two hundred thousand people live in this, the capital of Germany. But by a 28-mile zigzagging boundary they are separated from Soviet-controlled East Berlin, with a population roughly half as large. On the one side—in free Berlin—are democracy, progress, hope; on the other side—the Soviet-occupied eastern sector—are dictatorship, decay, and despair.

West Berlin is an oasis of freedom, 110 miles inside the Iron Curtain. Thus it is completely encircled by a desert of Soviet domination.

Today, the Kremlin is apparently determined to wipe out this oasis. But free Berlin must and will endure. The United States has no alternative but to remain unalterably committed to the maintenance of the sovereignty and independence of free Berlin.

This is my firm conclusion, based upon a visit which I have just made to Berlin. I am writing these words from Helsinki, Finland, that stalwart country which itself symbolizes an unconquerable spirit.

During my tour of Berlin, I saw a great capital reborn from the devastation and rubble of World War II. I saw a city pulsating with life, with growth, with abundance of goods, with new housing, roads, stores. Most important, I saw the faith of its inhabitants reflected in their faces and their voices and their actions. And I discussed at length the problems of Berlin with our American diplomatic and military leaders and with the dynamic and courageous statesman who is the governing mayor of West Berlin, the remarkable Willy Brandt.

The present crisis boils down to one word, one key—access to the Red-surrounded city.

That means access by four highways, four railways, a canal system, and three corridors for airplanes.

Soviet strategy is simple, yet subtle. Communist plan is to go through the motions of transferring Russian checkpoints in East Germany which control Berlin-bound traffic. These control points govern movement of allied personnel and goods—United States, United Kingdom, and French. The points would thus theoretically come under the administration of the Soviet-imposed regime known as the German Democratic Republic. This is the stooge state invented by the Soviet Union to enslave 18 million East Germans.

The supposed turnover of control from Russian to East German hands would be made under the pretense that the Soviet Union would allegedly be ending the four-power occupation regime in Berlin.

Actually, the entire Soviet plan is regarded even by neutral observers as one vast tissue of lies.

It is a lie because East Berlin would still be dominated and controlled by the continued presence in East Germany of 5 German Communist divisions and 20 Soviet Red Army divisions.

It is a lie because no party to a solemn contract—neither the Soviet Union nor any other participant in the four-power legal instruments—has the right all by itself to break a binding commitment.

It is a lie because Russia could and would continue to call the tune at the traffic check points, rather than the so-called Pankow regime of the German Democratic Republic.

The very title of this Communist state—the German Democratic Republic—is a lie, because it is not "German" (but rather Russia, pulling the strings on Communist German marionettes.) It is not "Democratic" (because it does not represent the wishes of the East German people. Twenty thousand of them continue to pour in as refugees into West Berlin each month.) And it is not a "Republic (because, among other things, power does not come from the people to a freely chosen government; rather, power is imposed over the people by a Kremlin-appointed tyrant, named Walter Ulbricht.)

What then are the purposes of this latest in a long series of Soviet-precipitated crises? First, to legitimize the illegitimate East German Red regime and thereby help legitimize other Communist conquests in Eastern Europe. If the Soviets were to succeed in this forced recognition of their stooges, they would strike a devastating blow at the morale and the aspirations for liberty of all the subjugated peoples of Eastern Europe.

Second, to kill once and for all the possibility of the unification of divided Germany along genuinely democratic lines, with over 50 million free West Germans rejoined with 18 million East German victims of Red tyranny.

Third, to set the stage for the destruction of West Berlin, itself, as the advanced citadel of Western freedom. For if West Berlin were to be choked, as the Russians sought to do in the Berlin blockade 10 years ago, it would cease to be a magnet to the liberty-loving peoples, trapped behind the Iron Curtain. It would cease to be a showcase of Western democracy and progress, visible to a considerable extent within the curtained area.

It would cease to be a beacon of the truth to all the peoples of Eastern Europe, oppressed under the Soviet heel and lied to by Red propaganda.

To achieve all these results, the Soviets are masking their strategy by a seemingly innocent cloak. I refer to the apparently inoffensive turnover of Russian control at the traffic check points to East German forces. Actually, if the United States and its allies were to acquiesce and recognize this so-called turnover of control as anything but a sham, we would be starting a chain reaction which would lead to recognition of the German Communist regime. That in turn would explode wide open the entire Western position in Germany.

All this must not happen. But if we are to be successful in preventing it, we must open our eyes to a danger to Berlin which is this time more subtle than obvious or dramatic. This time, unlike the blockade of 1948, the Reds are not trying to choke us to death, but rather to administer slow poison. It is poison in small doses—a little bit at a time. (That means recognizing Communist illegitimacy step by step.) Thus, soon the victims—ourselves and the West Germans—would wake up and find that our position had been given a lethal accumulation of Red poison.

The decision for us is therefore certain. We stand irreversibly with West Berlin, with West Germany, with our allies and against recognition of the hammer and sickle gang of Walter Ulbricht and Company.

Free Berlin is the message of the Voice of America in living reality. It embodies the hopes and aspirations of the gallant German workers who, in June 1953, fought with their bare hands and rocks against Soviet tanks. It represents the goals of the freedom fighters of Hungary.

As long as free Berlin exists, the crown will be uneasy on the heads of the tyrants of the Soviet Empire.

COMMUNICATING TO THE PEOPLES OF THE SOVIET UNION—TEXTS OF SENATOR HUMPHREY'S COMMENTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, no one can read the press reports of the disturbing remarks of Premier Nikita Khrushchev at the 21st Congress of the Communist Party in Moscow without realizing what an enormous gulf exists between the thinking of ourselves and the leaders of the Soviet Union.

Determining how to communicate with those leaders and with the people of the Soviet Union represents a tremendous challenge to us.

Not only do we speak different languages, in terms of English and Russian, but words have a different meaning for us, words like "freedom," "peace," "democracy," and others.

We have, in effect, different frames of reference. We have different cultures, widely varied histories, and other backgrounds.

CENSORSHIP ON SOVIET MEDIUMS

What complicates our problem is, of course, that we do not have available regular open channels of communications. The Soviet mediums are, of course, so heavily censored that only a tiny fraction of the truth about America, as we know it, gets across to the people of that vast country. By contrast, American mediums are almost completely open to reports of Soviet news and views.

Accordingly, when I visited the Soviet Union at the end of last November and the start of December, I sought to try to communicate as best I could both with the Soviet leaders and with the people. I tried to meet as many individuals as possible—the man in the street, youngsters in schools, doctors in hospitals.

MY REQUESTS TO INTOURIST

I asked the Intourist Office, which assisted in my visit, for certain opportunities as well.

I asked for a still photographer to accompany me. That request was granted, and so I was able to bring back photos depicting some of my experiences and the individuals whom I met.

I asked to have a 16 millimeter motion picture photographer to accompany us, for example, in medical research laboratories. I hope to be able to show the people of my State, and the people of other States, and Members of Congress, who might be interested, the actual scenes which I have attempted subsequently to describe in the course of my various public comments. But the request for the motion picture photographer was not granted.

I asked for the right to have a tape recorder available. I hoped that if any Soviet official desired to speak on the record, in whole or in part, we could have an exact verbatim text of what he wanted to communicate—in his own words and in his own voice. Here, again, the request was not granted.

MY APPEARANCE ON SOVIET TV

I asked—still again to the astonishment of some of my Soviet acquaintances—for the right to speak on Soviet television and radio. Two days later, this request was granted. I appeared on Moscow television on the night of Tuesday, December 3, in the 10:30 news broadcast. My remarks were completely uncensored. I spoke with a few notes, but by and large, spontaneously. Each of my sentences was translated in turn by a Soviet interpreter. A Russian-speaking American, who was with me, indicated that the Soviet translation was completely faithful to my phraseology in English.

LET MORE AMERICANS APPEAR ON SOVIET TV

I may say, that to my knowledge, no American with but one exception had appeared in this manner previously on Soviet television. That exception was Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson who delivered a few comments on the occasion of the Fourth of July.

In addition, it should be noted that several NBC–TV "Youth Wants To Know" programs had also been presented. But they had appeared through film recordings and only on a reciprocal basis in exchange for a series of interviews with Soviet leaders which were presented on U.S. television.

The principle of reciprocity is fine. But the principle of spontaneity is even finer.

I hope that future American visitors will have the right to appear uncensored on Soviet TV as well. Time after time, American TV has shown Soviet officials, as in the case of Ambassador Menshikov and First Deputy Premier Mikoyan. They were free to say whatever they pleased in the course of the interviews.

What is more, our TV news programs are crammed full of AP and UPI dispatches out of Moscow. These dispatches are, of course, free, uncensored, unaffected by the U.S. Government—in stark contrast to the incredibly biased Tass dispatches over Soviet media. The latter are propaganda-filled reports which might just as well have been written by the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

TAPE RECORDING FOR RADIO MOSCOW

While I was at the TV studio, I made a radio tape recording—again, with uncensored observations. It consisted of a frank interview with Mr. Joseph Adamoff of Radio Moscow who had served as my interpreter on the TV news program. How this tape recording was utilized and if it was utilized at all—in whole or in part—I am not aware.

THE IZVESTIA ARTICLE THAT NEVER APPEARED

Finally, I asked for the right to communicate to the Soviet people through the medium of my own uncensored views in a major newspaper. I asked whether such an article might appear in Izvestia or Pravda. The day before my departure, on Wednesday, December 4, that request was granted. I prepared such an article, I sent it on the 5th, but unfortunately, it never appeared.

I send to the desk now the text of the talk which I delivered over Moscow television. I append to it the text of the remarks which I had prepared for Izvestia but which were never published.

I ask unanimous consent that both of these items be printed in the body of the RECORD. I offer them as two illustrations of the ways by which I attempted, if only in small measure, to overcome this problem of the vast gulf between our two peoples.

I earnestly hope that we in the legislative and executive branches will devote our best thinking to this problem of how to communicate to Soviet society.

TRIBUTE TO LACY-ZARUBIN AGREEMENT

In my judgment, the Lacy-Zarubin agreement for exchanges over the various media is an essential instrument of international good will. I earnestly hope that the agreement will not only be faithfully implemented in its second year, but that it will be renewed and broadened.

I hope, too, that it will be supplemented informally and spontaneously by still other cross-fertilization of ideas and presentation.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR HUBERT HUMPHREY OVER MOSCOW TELEVISION, DECEMBER 3, 1958

I personally appreciate the courtesy of appearing on Soviet television. It gives me the opportunity to bring you the warm and friendly greetings of the Government and people of the United States.

Mrs. Humphrey and I have enjoyed your great ballet—your fine music—your splendid art—we have tried to learn and better understand your people and country. I only wish we had the time to visit all parts of the Soviet Union. We want to know you and we want you to know us—to visit us and to learn of America. We must learn to live together.

Now, as to the purpose of our visit. We came here to seek areas of agreement—to advance a program of peace and better living. I have had long and frank discussions with the leaders of your government—in the fields of health, agriculture, education and trade. I have tried to improve and expand cooperation of your scientists and ours and of other nations. Yes, to seek cooperation aaginst the diseases which afflict mankind—cancer, heart disease, tuberculosis and others—the diseases that affect our children.

I have appreciated the expressions of cooperation which have been given to me by your leaders—but while I have been here, I have discussed with your leaders a subject of the greatest of all importance to mankind—a just and lasting peace.

The dearest wish in the heart of the Russian people and the American people, yes of all people, is peace. The United States of America is dedicated to peace—peace with justice.

The peoples of the Soviet Union have suffered terribly from war, and so have we. You want peace and we want peace. There is no problem which cannot be solved in peace. Our President, Mr. Eisenhower, fought along side of you in war. He, and the American people want the opportunity of cooperating with you in the works of peace. The only war we want to fight—is the war against the ancient enemies of all mankind—war against disease, against poverty, against misery, against ignorance, and fear. Let us, therefore, together dedicate our policies, our energies to raising the standard of living everywhere for all mankind. Let us seek to give dignity to life by emphasizing the spiritual and physical well-being of people—through the arts, through science, through education, through better living and working conditions. In this all nations can join and cooperate. The peoples of the world are tired of war—threats of war—and misery—they seek peace and security. They seek peace with justice.

My good wishes and thanks to the Russian people.

ARTICLE WHICH HAD BEEN PREPARED FOR IZVESTIA BY SENATOR HUBERT HUMPHREY

I have spent a fruitful week in the Soviet Union.

I have enjoyed friendly and frank discussions with your leaders.

Most helpful was the extended interview which I had with the Chairman of the Soviet Council of Ministers, Mr. N. S. Khrushchev.

I also had the opportunity to speak with Deputy Chairman F. R. Kozlov, Minister Andrei Gromyko, Minister V. V. Matskevich, Minister V. P. Yelutin, Deputy Minister M. R. Kuzmin, and others.

I wish that I might have had more opportunity not only to see and talk with other Soviet leaders, but to visit more areas of your vast country and to speak with more of your people. Unfortunately the limitation on my available time prevented me from doing so on this trip. I hope, however, next year to have an opportunity for a more prolonged stay with further fruitful discussions.

I came particularly in my capacity as chairman of a U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Medical Research. My purpose was and is to explore the possibilities of further cooperation between the scientists of the U.S.S.R. and the scientists of the United States and of all other nations in the war against disease.

I refer specifically to the need to conquer cancer which last year killed almost a quarter of a million Russians and a nearly equal number of Americans. I refer to the need to conquer heart disease, arthritis, rheumatism, neurological ailments and other scourges afflicting both adults and children. Then, too, among the countries which are striving to develop their economies and create new industries, there are a host of infectious diseases which the United States, the Soviet Union and other countries can aid in conquering—diseases like malaria, tuberculosis, yaws, trachoma which blight the lives of millions in Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and South America.

I made a series of recommendations on improving world health to Premier Khrushchev, and I am most pleased to say that he greeted them favorably. To implement broad policies, I made numerous specific health proposals. These, too, met with favorable reactions from other Soviet officials. For example, I met with your Deputy Minister of Health, Dr. V. M. Zhdanov and the Vice President of the Academy of Medical Sciences, Professor S. A. Sarkisov. I met with your distinguished Professor Nikolai Blokhin, Director of the Institute of Experimental Pathology and Therapy of Cancer. These men symbolize the very finest caliber of medical science anywhere in the world. We want to work shoulder to shoulder with these and other medical scientists in helping to heal the sick of your, our own and all nations.

I mentioned to your leaders that this, indeed, is the only type of war that the United States wishes to fight. I mean a humanitarian war against our common enemies such as disease, ignorance, misery, poverty, and fear. I mean a war which will bring happiness instead of heartbreak to mankind because it will help men to live better and longer rather than to die.

Of course, the people and the Government of the United States of America are dedicated above all to the successful solution of the greatest problem facing mankind—the establishment and preservation of a just and enduring peace.

The people and the Government of the United States will leave no stone unturned to try to resolve tensions, to narrow areas of disagreement and to widen areas of agreement between ourselves and the U.S.S.R.

Toward that end, we seek to collaborate on specific works of peace. One such work is health for peace. Another such work is culture for peace.

Here in Moscow I have enjoyed your great ballet, music, and art. We Americans wish to see more of your great culture, and we would like you to get to know more of American culture.

We want more and more of your people, your artists, and your leaders to come to visit us. Let us eliminate the barriers which prevent the freest possible exchange of persons and ideas and information. Let us explore every possible avenue by which the cause of peace and understanding may be advanced.

I hope that the Soviet people understand the tremendous stake which the American people have in the avoidance of war. Three-quarters of our families own their own homes and their own automobiles, which war would all destroy. Ninety-five percent of our farms are served by electricity, and the country has almost 70 million telephones. This too would all disappear in a war. The industrial worker, whose average wage for a 40-hour week is now about $75 (750 rubles), has a great interest in the continued existence and prosperity of his factory, and so also do the many millions of Americans who own these factories through the shares which they have bought.

Our tasks for the future are huge. If there are now almost 3½ million Americans in higher educational institutions, we must plan for facilities for twice that number by 1975. We have recently embarked on a 13-year highway program to cost $33 billion which will add 40,000 miles of superhighways throughout the country to the millions of miles of hard surfaced roads which have already been built. With the never-ending expansion of our cities, we must cope with their reconstruction along modern lines and with the provision of millions of new houses and apartments for the increasing population, in addition to the almost 15 million built in the last decade. At the same time, we are devoting more money every year to scientific research and medical and health programs.

While all this goes on, we are never forgetful of our obligations to those countries which are just now developing their economies and consolidating their independence. Billions of dollars in the last 10 years have gone in the form of economic assistance from both private and public American sources to almost every country in the world to help accelerate the pace of their advance.

Of course it is true that a dedication to peace and a tremendous material interest in maintaining peace are not enough by themselves to guarantee the attainment of the goal which we all seek. We must also come to an understanding with the Soviet Union and other countries in the world about the many issues dividing us which pose a threat to peace. Moreover, it is essential for us to recognize that each country may have a different view of what constitutes a truly just peace, exactly as each country has its own beliefs about the definition of its national interests.

We Americans cannot expect the Soviet people or others to accept all of our opinions on international issues, just as we do not often accept the Soviet viewpoint. But it is vital that each side know the viewpoint of the other in clear and objective form. Only then will all the people in each country be able to judge the difficulties and alternatives as they really are. One reason that I feel informed about the position of the Soviet Union even though I have not visited here before is that I have for years read the texts and reports of statements of Soviet leaders and the Soviet Government in American newspapers. I think that this is a practice which we should all follow.

I have been told that the Soviet people are sometimes confused by the many voices which come from the United States, from American books and newspapers. It is only natural that in our great debates on policies to be followed in the most crucial questions of domestic and international affairs, large numbers of citizens will have widely differing opinions about what should be done to promote our national welfare, our national security, and world peace. It may be helpful to say that only when the debate has crystallized into an official position of the Government of the United States can it be said that America has taken a stand on a question. In this, the most important thing to remember is that, by every objective condition of our national life which I have listed, as well as by the most earnest wishes of all of our citizens, the fundamental goal of the United States is to avoid war and to preserve the peace with justice which we all need so much.

As I return home to continue my work, I feel considerably heartened by my short stay in the Soviet Union. I will not pretend that the road ahead will be easy. In fact, there have been few more difficult periods in history. Nevertheless, we have good grounds for hope and I know that President Eisenhower will do everything possible in his efforts to fulfill our common hopes for peace.

BOY SCOUTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is a pleasure at this time to have the opportunity to pay tribute to the Boy Scouts of America. This month the Boy Scouts of America are celebrating the 49th anniversary of the chartering of their organization by the Congress.

The spiritual ideals and the healthy out-of-door training of the Boy Scouts have helped immeasurably to strengthen American manhood in body, mind, and soul. The Boy Scouts have lived up to their objective: "Onward for God and my country." In doing so they have gained the gratitude of the Nation.

A good Scout learns the joy that comes from helping people; he builds radiant health from good living habits; he gains knowledge of the world about him; he knows the meaning of freedom and its obligations; he gains recognition because of worthy attainments. No training of youth could prepare a man to accept the responsibilities of adulthood better than that offered by the Boy Scouts.

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION AND FRAUDULENT ADVERTISING

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "The Medicine Man Under the Eagle's Eye," written by Representative JOHN A. BLATNIK, of Minnesota, and printed in the Progressive magazine for November 1958. The article summarizes the findings and recommendations of the Subcommittee on Legal and Monetary Affairs of the House Committee on Government Operations, under the chairmanship of Representative BLATNIK, in its inquiry into four areas of the activities of the Federal Trade Commission. The subcommittee concerned itself with FTC efficiency in the field of false and misleading advertising of weight-reducing preparations, dentifrices, prescription tranquilizing drugs, and filter-tip cigarettes.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MEDICINE MAN UNDER THE EAGLE'S EYE

(By JOHN A. BLATNIK)

When Thetis dipped her son, Achilles, into the River Styx, that much-touted wound-proofing lotion had an unadvertised shortcoming. Since that time all of us have shown an Achilles' heel to advertising, no matter how sophisticated we may be. We may be impervious to the "hard sell," yet succumb to the "soft sell," or to the subliminal approach, or to the hidden appeal to subconscious urges. Most importantly, however, untrained as we are in the medical sciences, we succumb to the pseudo-scientific presentation, documented by testimonials from "independent research organizations," consecrated by cleverly worded references to "U.S. Government approval," bolstered by meaningless comparisons, adorned with empty claims to novelty or exclusivity ("No other product contains this patented ingredient"). We may smile at the naivete with which people believed in the magic power of bezoar stones or unicorn powder, but promise us a concoction that will remove middle-age spread, assuage our jitters, or prevent cavities in our teeth, and we will run, not walk, to the nearest drugstore.

The purchasers of bezoar stones lived in the age of caveat emptor (let the buyer beware), but we have grown accustomed to the protection of Uncle Sam and assume that he will not permit us to be deceived by modern alchemists and purveyors of witchcraft. We assume that the professional-looking man in a white coat who comes into our living room through the TV screen or appears in full color in our favorite magazine would not tell us an untrue story, or, if he did, that he would suffer dire consequences.

Surely the Federal Trade Commission, we feel certain, will protect us from unscrupulous advertisers who would capitalize on our longing for the slender form, decayproof teeth, peace of mind, or harmless cigarettes. The law charges the FTC with that responsibility, and the taxpayer provides it with an annual budget of $6 million to discharge that and other duties.

But when hearings of the Subcommittee on Legal and Monetary Affairs of the House Committee on Government Operations, over which I presided, recently examined four areas of FTC activities, it found the FTC wanting in all four. The subcommittee concerned itself with FTC efficiency in the field of false and misleading advertising of weight-reducing preparations, dentifrices, prescription tranquilizing drugs, and filter-tip cigarettes.

CIGARETTE FILTERS

Medical men and the U.S. Government pretty much agree that there is some relationship between smoking and the incidence of lung cancer and heart disease. And while research to date is not entirely definitive, enough evidence has been unearthed and enough publicity given to the dangers of smoking to prompt smokers to reduce or abandon their use of cigarettes. When the sale of cigarettes actually dropped a few years ago for the first time in over a decade, cigarette manufacturers attempted to counteract the trend by the wholesale adoption of the filtertip, supposed to remove the elements in tobacco smoke that seem to be a danger to health.

The stiff competition between the various cigarette brands to reclaim their share of the falling market resulted in extreme claims for the effectiveness of the filter, claims that seem to have reassured the smoker, if rising sales are a criterion. But are these claims true?

Nicotine and tar are believed to be the elements in tobacco smoke which are dangerous to health. But many of the filter-tipped cigarettes of today actually contain more of these elements than they did when they first came on the market. For example, L & M, produced by Liggett & Myers, in 1955 contained 1.5 milligrams of nicotine and 11 milligrams of tar. Two years later there was a 70-percent increase in nicotine content and a 39-percent increase in tar in the smoke entering the lungs. In 1958, a more effective filter was widely advertised by L & M—and the tar content climbed to 17 milligrams. Of 17 brands tested, 11 produced less tar than L & M (King Sano, 40 percent less; Kent, 30 percent; Marlboro, Old Gold, and Parliament, 18 percent; PM, Tareyton and Viceroy 12 percent, and Lucky Strike 6 percent less). In June 1958 six prominent brands of cigarettes were all advertising "lowest tar content."

What is the consumer to believe? And what are the standards for measuring and controlling the potentially harmful elements in tobacco, and the truthful advertising of this information, of such vital concern to so many millions of citizens?

The tar and nicotine content of cigarette smoke depends on the tobacco blend as well as on the filter. Almost every brand of cigarette changes its blend frequently, and the content of harmful tars may go up as well as down. Winston advertised a blend "specially refined for filter smoking," yet it was one of the strongest cigarettes tested—58 percent more tar than Kents, 36 percent more than Parliaments.

The power of the Federal Trade Commission is limited in controlling tobacco advertising because it does not have the power to ask a court injunction in this field, as it does in foods, drugs, cosmetics, and devices. In my opinion, the health problem of cigarettes has reached such a point that I believe it imperative to enact legislation empowering the FTC to request an injunction when it deems this action necesssary.

Furthermore, I feel strongly that the law should require cigarette manufacturers to label their products "contains not more than —— milligrams of nicotine; not more than —— milligrams of tar," and that the label should change with every alteration in the blend of tobacco used. Then and only then will the consumer—and the FTC—have a fighting chance of filtering out the truth from the murky haze of cigarette advertising. I have already introduced such legislation and plan to reintroduce it next year.

WEIGHT REDUCING

To weigh less, you must eat less. Overweight stems primarily from overeating, or from eating fattening foods. To lose weight, we must reduce our food intake in terms of calories. Drugs and other methods may be an aid, but the primary method is diet.

This was the opinion of private and Government doctors appearing before our subcommittee—yet for years the advertising media have resounded with claims of "no-diet reducing." It was not until after our hearings that the FTC moved to halt some of these deceptions.

When our hearings were held, the FTC had not proceeded against any falsely advertised weight-reducing preparations in more than 12 years because in 1946, a U.S. court of appeals had decided against the FTC in a proceeding concerning Ayds, a caramel candy which is still widely advertised. The FTC itself admitted that the case was poorly tried.

While the FTC has failed to protect consumers against these unwarranted claims, a limited consumer protection has been furnished by the Post Office Department, which can proceed only against fraudulent mail solicitation of money. The Post Office has successfully proceeded against more than 40 phony weight reducers since 1955. This is all the more significant because the Post Office Department in its proceedings must not only prove that the advertising is misleading but (unlike the FTC) must also prove intent to defraud. The FTC, on the other hand, has jurisdiction over deceptive advertising through the mails (and elsewhere) regardless of money solicitation. This division of jurisdiction provides some very anomalous situations. In 1957, the Post Office, successfully barred Regimen from using the mails for its solicitation but could do nothing about newspaper advertisements featuring the copy found objectionable in the Post Office proceeding because it contained no solicitation of money through the mails.

Since the spring of this year the FTC has instituted proceedings involving these weight reducing products: Pounds-Off, made by the General Products Corp.; Hungrex, by Allegheny Pharmacal Corp.; K–12, by the Practical Research Co.; Du-Dol, by the Anderson Pharmacal Corp.; and Regimen, by the Drug Research Corp.

The Post Office Department in 1940 had barred Ayds from mail solicitation and in July 1957 had obtained agreement from the maker of Hungrex to discontinue objectionable advertising.

Besides being useless as weight reducers, those preparations containing drugs may be dangerous to the health of many stout people who suffer from other ailments without being aware of them. (A study of 6,000 overweight people showed that 72 percent suffered from anemia, 18 percent from diabetes, 22 percent from heart disease, 37 percent from nervous, or psychogenic disorders, and 7 percent from gall bladder disease. Each of these ills requires a special diet and medical attention; the self-medication and diet recommended by the weight reducing nostrums, not specifically designed for the particular need, is an unnecessary risk to them.)

The sale of phony weight reducers is big business, grossing an estimated $100 million yearly.

Dr. S. William Kalf, of Newark, N.J., a specialist in treating obesity, gave our subcommittee a medical expert's view of various types of over-the-counter reducing preparations:

Regimen, a product of Drug Research Corp., advertises "No Diet Reducing." Dr. Kalb comments: "Inside the package it says 'To weigh less, you must eat less. To reduce you must restrict your caloric intake.' Yet in their headline they don't say that. Such statements as "No-Diet Reducing Wonder Drug" are a deliberate falsehood in my opinion."

R.D.X., a product of Pharmaceuticals, Inc., advertises "Lose Ugly Fat, Yet Eat Plenty." "R.D.X. is a tablet," says Dr. Kalb, "and it tastes very good, too. This preparation has been on the market in one form or another ever since I was a little boy. It is made from powdered skim milk with a little lemon juice added to it. Now, if you think a tablet of skim milk and lemon juice is going to help you lose weight, go ahead and take it. It will never do any harm but it certainly won't help reduce. But there is a diet enclosed in the package, a thousand-calorie diet. You will lose weight on that whether you take the tablets or not."

Ayds is a product of the Carley division, Campagna Corp., which advertises, "I found Ayds and recaptured my figure." "These are caramels," Dr. Kalb reports. "The vitamins and minerals are just added as a come-on, and have no therapeutic value. The only difference between this and Hershey's is that Hershey uses regular cane sugar in theirs and these people use saccharin, or maybe they use sucaryl. But in order to offset the taste, they use a little more cream in this candy, so calorie for calorie this caramel is just about four, five, or six calories more than the ordinary caramel that you buy on the stands. This came out originally for diabetics. For diabetics it is all right; it doesn't make any difference about calories because a doctor can regulate the calories, but when we talk about weight reducing, then it is a fallacy."

Slim Mint, the delightful aid to appetite control, made by the Thompson Medical Co., which advertises "Take off pounds and inches, reduce." "This has methyl cellulose in it," the medical expert testified. "Now the average dose of methyl cellulose is a heaping tablespoonful, not just a small amount. If this chiclet contains a heaping tablespoonful I'd like to see where they put it. So the only thing this will do is give you a couple of cavities in your teeth."

DENTRIFICES

In 1957, more than $25 million was spent to advertise 12 toothpaste best sellers. The American Dental Association contends that much of this advertising has discouraged proper dental hygiene and that many of the advertising claims for dentifrices are misleading and may be detrimental to dental and general health.

Dr. Harry Lyons, past association president and dean of the School of Dentistry of the Medical College of Virginia, told us that "the patient contributes to his or her mouth cleanliness chiefly by the skillful and judicious use of a suitable toothbrush, with or without a dentifrice. * * *" Toothpastes are appreciated professionally because of their abrasive and detergent action and their pleasant taste, but beyond this, Dr. Lyon concluded, "no other merits for dentifrices have been scientifically established."

The three general themes running through dentifrice advertising are:

1. Arrest of dental decay.
2. Elimination of bad breath.
3. Adequacy of using a dentifrice only once a day.

Dr. Lyons said dental decay cannot be avoided merely by the use of a dentifrice, and the false promise of immunity held out by dentifrice advertisers encourages neglect of the teeth.

The assurance of elimination of bad breath by use of a dentifrice creates a false sense of security and may be misleading. Although Dr. Lyons conceded that mouth odors may be caused by decomposition of food, he pointed out that other causes are: chronically infected sinuses, infectious or other lung conditions, nasal infections, gastrointestinal disorders, and diabetes.

Brushing the teeth after each meal is a prime requisite for good oral hygiene; advertising to the contrary, it was said, can only lead to poor dental health.

Dr. Sholom Pearlman, assistant secretary of ADA's Council on Dental Therapeutics, reviewed the advertising of some specific products, including Super-Ammident with fluoride (Block Drug Co.); Brisk and Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol (Colgate-Palmolive); Crest and Gleem with GL–70 (Procter & Gamble); Ipana with WD–9 (Bristol-Myers Co.); Pepsodent with Irium and Stripe with hexachlorophene (Lever Bros.).

The claims made for these products include such statements as "Saves your teeth from decay"; "Look, Mom—no cavities"; "Only Brisk toothpaste gives you the same fluoride dentists use"; "Just one brushing destroys decay—and odor-causing bacteria"; "Colgate's with Gardol stops mouth odor all day * * * with just one brushing"; "A single brushing with Stripe with hexachlorophene will protect you against the cause of decay."

Dr. Pearlman's analysis of the advertising may be fairly summed up in the Scottish verdict "not proved." There is no scientific evidence, he states, that the fluoride used in toothpaste, the amount, and the method of application will save teeth from decay. What the dentist uses in his office is usually a 2-percent solution of fluoride (as compared to about one-tenth of 1 percent in Brisk) and it is applied under completely different circumstances and conditions in a manner that has been demonstrated repeatedly by respected scientists in the Public Health Service to give a substantial benefit in the form of decay protection. Direct application in the toothpaste, as far as we know, has not been tested.

Stopping mouth odor with a dentifrice is practically impossible because of the many things introduced into the mouth during the day, and there is no evidence that Gardol provides an invisible shield in the first place. Furthermore, masking mouth odor may be a health hazard if a potential disease situation is also masked—like using perfume when you really need a bath.

"Just one brushing * * *" is a direct attempt to discourage the sound dental health practice of brushing after each meal. There is no evidence available that a single daily brushing with any of the dentifrices that use this approach in their advertising fights tooth decay all day.

FTC Chairman John W. Gwynne cited 34 cease-and-desist orders and 27 stipulations to discontinue objectionable dentifrice advertising. However, the most recent of these orders was handed down in 1951 and the most recent stipulation executed in 1947.

Chairman Gwynne, after citing difficulties of proof, emphasized the lack of funds for testing facilities:

"We have never attempted to obtain an actual estimate of the cost that would be involved in such a study because of our budgetary limitations for such purposes but we can easily envision the expenditure of $25,000 to $50,000 in the testing of one or two dentifrices.

"These are the basic problems which the Commission faces in formal action against manufacturers of dental products. Solution of these problems is a matter of fundamental economics. If the Congress desires to buy for the public adequate protection in the dental product advertising field, it has it in its power to do so. The Commission stands ready to carry out the required testing program, but lacks resources to do so."

TRANQUILIZING DRUGS

The term "tranquilizer" in its true meaning refers only to so-called ethical drugs which cannot be sold without a doctor's prescription. Contrary to a popular notion, even the most widely known tranquilizers are obtainable only on prescription.

The 1939 FTC Act, which invests the Commission with powers to combat false advertising, restricts these powers where a drug is advertised solely to the medical profession. But the extent of this restriction is not clear. The law says no drug advertisement shall be deemed false if (1) it is directed only to the medical profession, (2) contains no false representation of a material fact, and (3) includes the formula of the drug's composition.

This confuses everyone, including the FTC. Following contradictory testimony by FTC officials regarding FTC jurisdiction over ethical drug advertising, the FTC Commissioner on the stand cut the Gordian knot by remarking that it was a lot easier to find a case elsewhere and that the Commission has just never been active in the field of professional advertising.

Now, the Food and Drug Administration also performs duties in this field, but it is limited to supervising the release of new drugs, and continuing surveillance over labeling practices, and does not cover advertising in medical journals and through the mails.

There exists, then, an area in which the FDA cannot and the FTC will not act. The entire responsibility falls on the doctor who is presumed to have full knowledge of the drug and its effects.

Several medical authorities testified that this presumption is not entirely warranted. Dr. Harry F. Dowling, chairman of the department of medicine at the University of Illinois, College of Medicine, told my subcommittee that fundamental knowledge regarding the actions and toxic effects of drugs is needed and this knowledge cannot be acquired by a practicing physician within a short period of time. Dr. Dowling also said that the rate at which new drugs are introduced is so rapid that the busy practitioner is unable to keep up with them.

Dr. Ian Stevenson, head of the department of neurology and phychiatry at the Medical School of the University of Virginia, complained that the techniques of merchandising have taken over in the field of ethical drug advertising. Dr. Stevenson said that when we are dealing with something as important as good health and the difference between living and dying, we are dealing with something different from shoes and automobiles and trips to Bermuda.

Medical experts appearing before the subcommittee cited the following instances of deceptive advertising of tranquilizing drugs: (1) Failure to cite known side effects. (2) Advertising "no known contraindications" in the face of documented knowledge to the contrary. (3) Reference to lengthy bibliographies which appear to, but do not, substantiate the advertised claims. (4) Quotation out of context, and omission of unfavorable passages from clinical reports. (5) One instance of out-and-out deception, where the company warned of drowsiness in the literature on its tranquilizer, but claimed "no impairment of physical efficiency" in the advertisements.

Dr. J. Murray Steele of the New York University School of Medicine, the chairman of a study group of New York's Academy of Medicine, told us that his committee, in 1956, found the literature "extravagant and distorted" and that it encouraged "indiscriminate use" of these drugs.

Dr. Joseph C. Garland, editor of the New England Journal of Medicine, wrote in his publication December 5, 1957:

"If I may speak for others as well as myself, we as physicians recognize and appreciate our ancient partnership and our friendly relations with our dynamic friends, the manufacturing apothecaries. We admire their scientific foundations and their genuine philanthropies and appreciate their cocktail parties, where our cups runneth over, but we stand a little in awe of the sinews that they have acquired.

"As editors we delight in the revenue from their adventures in competitive advertising, even as we seek to put restraints on its ultrapersuasiveness and keep it within the bounds that medical propriety and a sense of service to humanity have set. Our first duty is to the public, plainly enough, and so is theirs, for whereas much of modern advertising in general is designed to create a desire where there is no need, that of the drug business should still be patterned on the principle of responsibility to humankind."

The significance of this goes beyond tranquilizers. From time to time, a breakthrough occurs which promises mankind relief from some hitherto unconquered suffering. Such, in recent years, were the sulfa drugs, the antihistamines, the steroids, the antibiotics.

The two motivations of relief for the patient and profit for the manufacturer will combine to create, on the part of the manufacturer, a climate of eagerness to promote his discovery, to minimize dangers which are either unknown or ill defined, and on the part of physicians and sufferers an excessive readiness to accept claims as facts.

The safeguards provided by FDA are not enough. Once FDA gives a new drug the probationary status which permits its use by doctors, pressures from both manufacturers' agents and patients mount to a degree which many doctors cannot resist.

So it is that tranquilizers are recommended for the harassed housewife who has "washday blues," for the difficult child, for the after-dinner speaker who has "butterflies in his stomach," for the athlete before the meet, and the student before the exam.

Housewives, athletes, and students get wind of this solution to their problem and demand the "goof ball."

The doctor may fear that if he refuses, some colleague may not. So sales skyrocket, at least until the sobering second thought occurs, and when the dust has settled, one or two new drug concerns have come to the top of the heap; the industry has gained a few million dollars, and doctors and patients have gained—or suffered—in experience.

WHAT'S WRONG WITH THE FTC?

One FTC Commissioner told my subcommittee that "it takes a person who is really gullible to believe many of these ads." If this typifies the FTC position on deceptive advertising, then we are at the mercy of every unscrupulous huckster. Let the buyer beware should hardly be the attitude of the Government agency charged with protecting the consumer.

FTC has stood idly by for 20 years while the professional medical advertising provision of its charter has remained unclear and unsound. Certainly this is not a field to be completely ignored by the FTC.

Even where it has taken action against deceptive advertising, the FTC's enforcement record has been one of incredible delays. The average FTC enforcement process requires 2 years in contrast to 6 to 7 months at the Post Office Department. Such a delay is much longer than the sales effect of the incriminated advertising, and a much more summary action is necessary to stop deceptive advertising.

The FTC simply has not had the funds and therefore not the facilities or the personnel necessary to carry out a vigorous enforcement program against false and misleading advertising, especially in the advertising of medical products. The FTC has only two doctors on its staff, who were said by their superiors to be "stacked up beyond any load they can carry."

WHAT'S TO BE DONE?

Our hearings on cigarette advertising have stimulated the FTC to require from the tobacco manufacturers scientific proof for their technical claims. This encouraging development could well be extended to dentifrices, tranquilizers, or any product where advertising is capable of scientific proof.

A similar requirement could be the subject of a legislative change: to require food and drug advertisers to prove in FTC proceedings the truth of their advertised claims. Such a burden of proof is comparable to the proof required by the Food and Drug Administration before a new drug may be released and is preferable to the present burden of proof on the FTC to prove the falsity of a claim.

A legislative change might make mail fraud orders issued by the Post Office Department binding in FTC proceedings, so as to avoid a retrial of the same issues.

Other areas of legislative change might include:

(1) Transferring jurisdiction over all food and drug advertising to the Food and Drug Administration.

(2) Extension of Post Office powers to all fraudulent uses of the mails—not only those involving money solicitation.

(3) Enjoining advertising media from carrying any advertising which has been the subject of an FTC order, once they have been notified of such an order.

While my subcommittee is investigative in scope and has no authority to initiate and consider legislation, I am hopeful that legislative committees of the 86th Congress will consider some of the problems pointed up in our hearings. The suggested legislative changes should give an effective degree of protection to consumers. I think they are entitled to it.

ADDRESS BY LANSING P. SHIELD, PRESIDENT OF THE NEW JERSEY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, each year the members of the New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce come to Washington to hold an annual dinner in honor of the State's congressional delegation. This year, before a recordbreaking turnout of members of the organization, we heard a stimulating and thoughtful address by Lansing P. Shield, president of the State chamber. Mr. Shield, who is the president of the Grand Union Co. and former president of a national association of chain groups, made an effective plea for unity in the ranks of government, labor and industry, to help the United States advance its goals in the economic war with the Soviet world. He has made a concrete suggestion for a national meeting of leaders in the ranks of government, labor and industry to initiate discussions looking toward the development of unity in the common goal.

I have been encouraged by reports that more thought is being given by the administration toward the creation of a special planning board to coordinate the economic aspects of the cold war. Such coordination within government should receive the backing of a unified industry-labor movement.

I commend Mr. Shield's enlightened views to my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent that his address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF LANSING P. SHIELD, PRESIDENT, THE GRAND UNION CO. AND PRESIDENT, NEW JERSEY STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, AT ANNUAL DINNER IN HONOR OF THE STATE'S CONGRESSIONAL DELEGATION, HOTEL STATLER, WASHINGTON, D.C., THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1959

An unusual gathering of leaders of government, organized labor and industry such as this provides an opportunity for all of us to achieve better understanding. In these critical times, is there anything more urgent than the development of teamwork between these three important segments of our society? And this applies particularly to New Jersey—the most highly industrialized State in the Union.

Despite unparalleled prosperity and spectacular achievements in mass production and mass distribution, our economy in New Jersey and throughout the nation is labeled as a high-cost one—and as each month rolls by, the break-even point for both industry and government rises. We might as well face it, we are living in a plush economy. Because of high costs, world markets are slipping away from us.

Within the last 12 months, Khrushchev, Mikoyan and company have made trade agreements with 11 countries. During that same period we haven't signed a single agreement. In today's papers (Thursday, February 5, 1959) Khrushchev calls for the end of the cold war. This is understandable because he feels sure of victory in the hot economic war. In his speech yesterday before the 21st Soviet Party Congress in Moscow, he boasted that "economic competition was now enough to win the world to communism".

As a nation we are in danger of losing out to a competitor who has a built-in, low-cost austerity program. His economy, contrasted with ours, has a constantly lowering break-even point and the cost of goods in Russia is being steadily reduced.

The complete answer to the dilemma in which we find ourselves does not lie solely in reducing Government spending, freezing prices and wages, nor in further mechanization. We already lead the world in that area (I'm referring to mechanization—not spending) and it's ironical that the more we mechanize, the higher go our costs. The President has warned us that unless we reverse this trend which is weakening us both internally and externally, it may be necessary to put our economic body into a straitjacket in the form of wage and price controls. It is up to us to choose now between teamwork and dictation or the freedom of choice may be taken away from us.

As leaders in government, business, and labor, we have been fighting small battles among ourselves instead of presenting a united front—truly United States of America against our adversary, the Kremlin.

As an example, here in the United States, industry and organized labor meet as antagonists annually or biannually at the bargaining table and then withdraw until the next battle. Between political campaigns, government and industry often tear each other down.

While we have been trying to solve the problem of integration in race relationships, we have actually been practicing segregation in our economic relationships.

A form of class warfare is adding fuel to the flames that are licking at the foundations of our society and our freedoms. Recently a columnist in the New York Times pointed out that "both political parties seem to be solidifying along the lines of class interests."

Can anyone say there is a conscious, common effort to promote integration and understanding between organized labor and management—and to a somewhat lesser degree, between government and industry?

Recently, recognizing my own shortcomings in this area, I invited to lunch a well-known labor leader in a neighboring State and a United States Senator. After 2 hours in which we exchanged views (no holds barred) all three of us came away with a better understanding of the problems of the others and we all wanted another meeting.

This week one of the top labor leaders in New Jersey told me the time was overdue for management and labor to bury the hatchet, particularly in view of the international situation. It is heartening to find that leaders in every field are becoming aware of the necessity for government, labor, and industry to close ranks.

In a shooting war, we get together because we are thoroughly aroused to the common danger. If we are to win this hot economic war, a united front is equally imperative.

May I respectfully suggest to the representatives of Federal and State governments present tonight that industry would be glad to join any effort to bring about a closer working relationship with government and with labor. Perhaps an improved relationship might be initiated by a conference of leaders in Washington, followed by meetings at the State level. Such action would not only be good business and good politics, but would be a definite first step toward the objective of developing unity.

We must have unity to be productive. We must be productive to be strong. We must be strong to remain free.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its session today, it stand in adjournment until Thursday at noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE EVILS OF MONETARY INFLATION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, for some time I have wished to make some remarks, for the RECORD, in connection with the so-called battle of the budget, because I believe the importance of this issue is so great that it overrides that of all other issues involving public expenditures, and that not enough is known about the dangers of deficit financing and the dangers of monetary inflation, which usually is the result of deficit financing. Accordingly, Mr. President, today I venture to speak for a few moments on the subject of monetary inflation.

One of the reasons why it is difficult to deal with the evils of monetary inflation is that so few persons understand it. What is it? What causes it?

Since the battle of the budget will involve almost constant references to the dangers of inflation, I venture now to lay down a simple explanation of monetary inflation itself, thus hoping to make clear, for the RECORD, why monetary inflation is dangerous.

For the purpose of illustration, Mr. President, let us assume that for the fiscal year 1960 we face a Federal Government deficit of $10 billion. It is clear that at present we do not seem to face such a deficit. In this fiscal year the Government will incur a deficit somewhat in excess of $12 billion. It is now estimated at $12,900 million. But purely for illustrative purposes, let us assume that next year the Government might incur a deficit of $10 billion. That would mean that the tax revenues would be short by $10 billion of meeting the expenses. So, the Treasury—lacking tax income or other income with which to pay the $10 billion—would be forced to borrow that amount.

Ten billion dollars is a tremendous sum of money in relation to the entire market for new securities. Therefore, the Treasury must be careful not to take over the entire long-term market and "ruin it" for the towns, the cities, and the States which also need to borrow money, and many of which themselves are very hard pressed these days.

Furthermore, the Treasury must avoid ruining the market for the industries which need to finance job making expansions of plants, new facilities, and so forth.

If the Treasury is not careful, it can ruin this market, by absorbing so much of the long-term funds as to make it difficult for the towns, cities, States, and industries to finance themselves on a long-term basis.

Furthermore, if the United States were to sell long-term marketable securities to long-term investors—that is to say, to individuals, insurance companies, pension funds, and institutions, excluding commercial banks—the Treasury would have to offer a rate of interest well in excess of the current return on the so-called savings bonds. Why is this? It is because the latter—to wit, the savings bonds—have a guaranteed market in the Treasury itself; the Treasury must buy the savings bonds upon demand by the savers, and at a fixed, prearranged price, giving back to the savers their money, with interest which varies in accordance with the term or the time they have held the bonds. This valuable "put" privilege of the savings bonds holders actually give their bonds an advantage the open-market bonds do not enjoy. Thus, the latter usually carry higher interest rates, in order to compensate for the market risk, which is nonexistent in the case of the savings bonds.

Marketable bonds, such as the old Victory bonds, Liberty bonds, and long-term Treasurys, such as the 3½s of 1990 which now are outstanding, usually fluctuate in value, and may sell well below the original offering price if conditions in the long-term money market become firmer or tighten up. Tight money always depresses the market value of all long-term marketable bonds; and easy money tends to buoy them up in price.

So, in view of all the foregoing, the Treasury is likely usually to be forced to finance its deficit through the issuance of shorter term securities which would be acceptable to commercial banks and other investors having need for relatively liquid assets.

When the long-term bond market is closed to it for the reasons I have pointed out, the Treasury must approach the banks, and other short-term investors and make the best deal it can for the $10 billion, which is the theoretical deficit we are discussing. It must make this deal in short-term notes. I shall come to that in a moment.

There is really no alternative course left open to the Treasury. For simplicity, let us suppose the $10 billion financing is handled in one transaction. Actually, it would be done in several deals, but for the purpose of illustrating monetary inflation, let us say there is one transaction. This is a perfectly valid assumption. There is just one transaction, with the Treasury selling its $10 billion worth of I O U's to a group of banks. For simplicity, let us call those banks "Mr. Banks."

The Secretary of the Treasury says, "Mr. Banks, I want to borrow $10 billion for just as long as you will lend it to me. What maturity do you suggest, and at what interest rate?"

Mr. Banks says, "You know, Mr. Secretary, my deposits are mostly subject to withdrawal on demand. I have demand deposits to invest. Therefore, I must confine investment in marketable securities to short-term maturities, say 1 to 4 years, because the market in short maturities is more stable, price fluctuations are narrow, and I can always sell the short securities instantly, or borrow against them temporarily from the Federal Reserve banks. Thus my demand deposits are well protected, and bank examiners will find me ready for any eventuality.

"Bank examiners discourage banks from investing in marketable commitments which might shrink parent assets and shrink a bank's ability to meet demands of depositors. So, Mr. Secretary, I require short maturities, 1 to 4 years, and I am willing to accept interest at the going rates now applicable to your outstanding notes of comparable maturities. Today these interest rates yield, for 1 year, about 3.4 percent; 2 years, about 3.8 percent; 3 years, about 3.7 percent; and 4 years, about 3.8 percent."

So much for Mr. Banks' statement.

The Secretary of the Treasury now states, "Very well, Mr. Banks. I accept your terms, because I understand you must have short maturities. We can hardly argue about interest rates when the broad market establishes interest rates for us."

That is the end of the Secretary's comment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I should like to finish this discourse. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania or to any other Senator.

So again, for simplification, let us assume the Secretary of the Treasury gives Mr. Banks $10 billion in Treasury obligations. Note carefully what happens because here is the point where monetary inflation rears its ugly head.

Mr. Banks puts the Treasury notes in a vault with other assets, and credits his assets account with a $10 billion entry—"U.S. Treasury notes, $10 billion," on the assets side of the ledger. Then he credits the deposit account of the Treasury with $10 billion.

Banks does not give the Treasury a check. He does not give it cash. He credits the Treasury deposit account with $10 billion. The Treasury can then draw checks against the credit to pay the Federal Government's bills. Banks has thus simply added $10 billion to the money supply in the United States. He has inflated the existing total supply of all our money by $10 billion. That is the important point about deficit financing through the banking system.

At this point we should understand that our U.S. money supply consists of two elements: One, total demand deposits in all banks, now about $115 billion; plus all currency in circulation—that is, paper money, currency in our pockets, in our socks, or under the mattress—which now amounts to about $30 billion.

So the inflationary effect of this $10 billion transaction is evident when we see that demand deposits of $115 billion, plus currency in circulation of $30 billion, gives us a total money supply of $145 billion before this $10 billion transaction.

Again, plain arithmetic indicates that $10 billion is almost 7 percent of $145 billion; and the money supply has therefore been inflated by approximately 7 percent. That is monetary inflation.

This is the same as using printing press money to dilute the value of our money supply. There is actually no difference in the result. We have simply created demand deposits, instead of printing the added folding currency. We have used the banks' "check money" instead of the Government printing press. The result is exactly the same.

So when the critics say that we have used "printing press money," they are correct. The Government has not "earned," but has merely created out of whole cloth, $10 billion. We have debased the existing money supply by 7 percent. Thus, the savers, pensioners, social security recipients, and all our people living on fixed incomes, have had the equivalent of a cut in income of 7 percent in 1 year, at one fell swoop. Their money has been debased, cheapened, "clipped," by 7 percent.

Let us bear in mind that if the Treasury had sold its bonds to long-term investors—that is, individuals, institutions, pension funds, insurance companies, and the like—there would have been little monetary inflation, because each investor would buy his bonds with cash which he had on hand or on deposit in a bank. No new money would then be created.

This is the important difference to remember. If long-term bonds were sold, there would be no monetary inflation, because the banks would not buy them and would not create additions to the monetary supply. If the very short maturities were sold, they would have an inflationary effect, in that they are similar to currency, although they bear interest—that is, if such short-term investments had been sold in the open market to investors such as I have mentioned. But long-term bonds are put away for long-term investment. They are bought by nonbank investors; and they create, in a general way, I think it is safe to say, no danger of monetary inflation. The sale of such bonds does not add to the money supply.

Whose duty is it to avoid monetary inflation and prevent the threat of its occurring again in the fiscal year 1960? The President has sent the Congress a budget of $77 billion, balanced by income estimates. He has done his duty. Probably no President ever worked harder on a budget, or made so clear to Congress and the people the absolute necessity of maintaining the balance.

So it is now up to the Congress.

Will the Congress have the political courage to do its plain duty? Or will it yield to the pressures of the powerful pressure group leaders whose selfish interests are served best by forcing increased Federal spending in many programs, and putting new programs on the books?

Thus, the Democratic Party leaders in Congress face this challenge. They have the votes. They can follow the advice of the Democratic advisory council, the ADA, and leftwing groups and, by so doing, further crucify the "little fellow," whom they profess to guard and favor.

Or they can courageously do what I believe to be their plain duty, and require a balanced budget to really protect the "little fellow"—the weak, the defenseless, the unorganized savers, pensioners, elderly retired folks, and so forth.

More than that, the Democrats can also destroy the silent weapon of communism in the United States, to wit, inflation.

It was Demaree Bess who last December wrote a very interesting article, for the Saturday Evening Post, which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some weeks ago, called "The Silent Weapon of Communism," in which he described inflation in this country as a veritable fifth column for the Russians or any potential enemy of the United States.

Thus the Democrats can protect our values, and make possible the continuance of our huge defense expenditures, which, by inflation, may be endangered or destroyed.

They can restore faith in the credit of the United States, which shows signs of serious deterioration. Upon the credit of the United States, Mr. President, upon the soundness of the Yankee dollar, depends the future safety and security not only of the United States, but of the whole free world.

The Democratic Party leaders are showing concern about the state of our military defenses. But thus far not one has spoken of the mortal danger which we face if we allow our economic bases to crumble, and be taken by the enemy without the firing of a shot.

Surely the country deserves some assurance, some positive statement of intent to safeguard the credit of the United States, rather than the constant rumbling sounds of new spending bills being dropped in the hopper without any responsible concern for the means to pay for them. Rather, one is impressed with the happy, gay, somewhat Pollyanna attitude that "Everything will come out all right if we just spend more money." All we have to do is to "spend ourselves rich," it seems.

Sylvia Porter recently dealt with this serious issue in an excellent column published in the Washington Evening Star entitled "Milton Berle Explains Inflation." The article was quite amusing. I laughed about it. However, it recalled the song, "I'm Dancing With Tears in My Eyes." The last paragraph of the column read:

> Not until the majority of Americans feel they're being more hurt than helped by rising levels of wages and prices will the cry come, "Halt."

Sylvia Porter is correct—unless Congress joins the President in his effort to avoid that calamity. But when that time comes, it will likely be too late. The damage will be done, and it may take years of agony and suffering to repair it. Indeed, it may be irreparable.

Do Senators remember the autumn of 1941? We went merrily along, having a good time, discounting the rumblings and warnings from Japan, being assured that everything was just dandy. Our fleet was tied up at the docks, and our sailors were mostly on shore leave, when suddenly came the attack on Pearl Harbor.

We waited until the people were hurt.

In 1929, we were told that we lived in a new era, that the old economic laws were outmoded, that water could now "run uphill." So we waited for the majority of Americans to get hurt. And how they got hurt. It took 10 years and a world war to correct that situation, with 9.5 million people still unemployed in 1939, 10 years after the new era began to look like "old hat."

The danger in Sylvia Porter's conclusion is that when the majority of Americans feel more hurt than helped, the damage will already have been done.

Mr. President, Congress must try to face this issue, which transcends all others in importance, for this reason: If we wait for more Americans to be hurt than helped, all America will be so crippled that our defenses will crumble, and a potential enemy will regard the United States as a "sitting duck." It will be "duck soup" for the men in the Kremlin.

No, Mr. President, the Congress must join the President now in persuading the people that our defenses depend upon sound economic and fiscal foundations.

We dare not wait for a people in agony to cry out for this protection against mortal danger. The American people sent us to Congress to represent them under a representative form of government. If the representatives fail, then the form of government will fail, and freedom may be lost.

I beg my friends on the Democratic side, I beg the leaders of the Democratic Party, to speak out now, before it is too late. I beg them to rally their party troops to the defense of the United States on the economic and fiscal battlefield, lest the loss of the battle of the budget could result in the loss of our freedom.

Mr. CLARK rose.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article written by Sylvia Porter, to which I referred, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILTON BERLE EXPLAINS INFLATION

Milton Berle was having a lot of fun with President Eisenhower's $77 billion budget on his TV show recently. Suddenly, during his monolog came this:

"Inflation? That means your money today won't buy as much as it would have during the depression when you didn't have any."

My family howled—and I ran for pencil and paper to write it down. For he had put into focus a basic aspect of our country.

Why hasn't there been a great outcry against rising prices, swelling public support for measures that really would stop the wage-price spiral? Why don't average Americans feel as strongly as, say, former President Herbert Hoover that inflation is the most monstrous economic evil there is? Why has grumbling about price rises not been translated into a crusade for price stability or at least, buyers' resistance?

Why is it that most union members are utterly unmoved when the experts try to explain that a $10 pay rise doesn't mean anything if the cost of living goes up $10 at the same time?

ANSWERS ARE OFFERED

The answer to the "why" lies behind Berle's wisecrack. Listen to what I heard as I checked the response to the remark. * * *

From the head of a big Wall Street financial house—a millionaire thoroughly aware of what dollar fluctuation means:

"Oh, that's a beauty, I wish I'd heard him say it. Yes, in the thirties, I could have bought four suits for what one costs today, and I could have had a mansion in the suburbs for the asking. But I didn't buy the four suits and I didn't take over the mansion because I didn't have the courage to splurge. I won't say it in public, but I'll say it to you if you don't identify me. While I think what has been happening to the dollar is terrible, I personally am better off than I ever dreamed I'd be, and so is my family. I wouldn't turn the clock back for anything."

From a middle-aged housewife who lives with her husband, a junior executive in a New York commercial firm, in a small apartment near my home:

"I've always lived in this neighborhood, and I remember passing by the grocery once—it must have been in 1938 or 1939—and seeing the whole window filled with eggs. On impulse, I wanted to go in and buy up the whole display, but Jim's pay had just been cut 10 percent, we were trying to live on $32.50 a week and both kids were in high school and, well, I just stood and stared into the window. Now I buy in that grocery every day and I buy whatever I want. I don't like rising prices, but I'd rather pay more and have the money to buy than see prices cheaper and be worried again. I suppose it's wrong, but I'm happy the way it is."

WIDOW NOT BADLY OFF

From an active member of the newspaper union in my office:

"Ha, I heard that show and I laughed, too. What does it mean to me? Well, during the depression, I didn't have any money, so it didn't matter to me what things cost because I couldn't buy them. Now my money buys less, but I have the money. Better off? Sure, I am. Did the union help? Of course it did, and I'm all for it."

From a widow, a friend of my mother's, who's living on insurance, social security, and income from a small investment portfolio:

"That's cute, and I know what he means. When Steve worked it out so I'd get $250 a month from insurance, I thought I'd live comfortably forever after. That dream is busted. But you know what's making up for it? My social security. And I've been making money on my stocks. I'm complaining, but I'm really not so badly off, honestly."

Not until the majority of Americans feel they're being more hurt than helped by rising levels of wages and prices will the cry come, "Halt."

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that an article written by Harold B. Dorsey, dated February 16, 1959, published in the Washington Post and Times Herald, under the title "Debt Refunding and Inflation" be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEBT REFUNDING AND INFLATION

(By Harold B. Dorsey)

It is most unfortunate so few people will understand the mechanics involved in an example last week of one of the dynamic consequences of current inflationary pressures. If the public—and if those well-meaning national leaders who have been generating the inflation pressures—understood this particular matter, there would be a better prospect that common sense based on a more complete knowledge of the facts would dictate policies which are vital to the public welfare.

The instance concerns the refinancing of the Government's mid-February debt maturities totaling $14.9 billion. At the risk of incurring the criticism of purists in the field of money and credit techniques, I would like to explain this refunding operation with the hope that it will promote a broader comprehension among average people of the way that circumstances are making it necessary to create money by the simple stroke of the pen.

Approximately $9.2 billion of the total mid-February Federal debt maturities was held by the public, the remainder being held by the Federal Reserve Banks and by Government investment accounts which almost invariably swap their maturing securities for the new securities in exchange. On the latter portion of the refinancing operation the matter of money supply was not involved, because savings of the economy that had formerly been loaned to the Government were merely transferred from one kind of security to another.

However, the holders of nearly $2.1 billion (approximately 23 percent) of the publicly held maturities refused the offer to relend the Government their savings for 1 year at 3¾ percent or for 3 years at 4 percent. They elected to have their savings paid back to them in the form of cash.

As a result of this unexpected cash requirement to pay off its creditors, the Treasury Department had to offer an even shorter term issue (217-day-maturity) for $1.5 billion. To a greater and greater extent, the Government is finding it necessary to use such short-term issues to finance the Government deficit and to refinance its maturities. Usually, this kind of issue is purchased largely by banks. The savings that might otherwise have been absorbed by investment in Government securities—in the current instance some $2.1 billion—thus becomes available to increase the demand for common stocks or for goods and services.

But let us see how the Government gets the money to pay off this $2 billion. What takes place on the books of the banks, which probably will be buying a large portion of the $1.5 billion of 217-day maturity new certificates that were offered to raise the major part of the necessary cash? It is this particular operation that is so broadly misunderstood.

A given bank will agree to take $1 million of these certificates. It will receive a piece of paper signifying that the Government owes the bank a million dollars and will add this piece of paper to its assets under the heading of "Holdings of Government Securities." It then credits the deposit account of the Government with a million dollars. This latter credit represents money that the Government can spend. Presumably, in the current instance, the Government will draw a check against its deposit account and will deliver that check to some holder of the maturing Government debt issue. The recipient will then deposit the check in his checking account with some bank. Thus it becomes money that he can spend for whatever purpose he chooses.

Recognize then that the net result of the whole transaction is an increase in the indebtedness of the Government to the bank, and by the simple stroke of a pen—without even using a printing press to manufacture currency—there is created a million dollars of spendable funds. The latter increases the wherewithal to enlarge the demand for common stocks, or for all types of goods and services.

One does not have to be a professional economist to understand that the artificially created increase in demand, without an offsetting increase in supply, creates an inflationary pressure for higher prices.

It appears to be an unfortunate fact that the inflation situation has reached the dangerous breeding stage. The saver's fear of inflation, concretely demonstrated by the foregoing incident, has made him unwilling to invest a normal proportion of his funds in longer term debt instruments. There is a very understandable hesitancy to lend money when there continues to be such a distinct threat that it will be repaid in dollars of lower purchasing power.

Herein, we can see the simple facts underpinning Federal Reserve Board Chairman Martin's recent observation to the Joint Economic Committee that: "There can be no effective control of inflation if the banking system is made the major source of funds to finance Government deficits." We have just seen an incident wherein the banking system had to be an important source of funds to refinance a portion of the Government's old debt. By the way, the interest charges alone on the Government's accumulated deficit of past years are budgeted at $185 per average family of four for the next fiscal year—which presumes that the Federal debt will not be increased further.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that an article published in the New York Times, written by Edwin L. Dale, Jr., entitled "Security Buyers Shun a U.S. Issue" be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with an editorial from the Times "High Road to Inflation."

There being no objection the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECURITY BUYERS SHUN A U.S. ISSUE—BAR EXCHANGE AND ASK CASH FOR $2 BILLION IN HOLDINGS—TREASURY SEEKS LOAN

(By Edwin L. Dale, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, February 6.—The major financial problem of the Eisenhower administration was revealed today.

The Treasury disclosed that this week's big financing had not been a success. Holders of more than 20 percent, or $2,081 million, of a huge amount of maturing Government securities refused to accept new securities offered in exchange.

As a result the Treasury will undertake an emergency borrowing operation next week to raise $1,500 million needed to pay off the old securities.

It is this problem, in the field of management of the national debt, that accounts as much as anything for President Eisenhower's feeling of urgency about a balanced budget. Officials insist there is no crisis, but their concern is undisguised.

HUGE DEFICIT BLAMED

The unanimous feeling among Government financial officials is that a balanced budget would make the problem of the Treasury in selling its securities much easier. The huge $13 billion deficit in the current budget has largely created the problem.

It is the equally unanimous view that emergency actions required by setbacks like the present one make the inflation problem worse.

This thought was back of the testimony today before the Joint Congressional Economic Committee by William McChesney Martin, Jr., Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. Mr. Martin said there was never a more important time than now to balance the budget. Mr. Martin thought there should be not only a balance, but also a sizable surplus.

Today's announcement gave the results of a major financing operation announced last week and conducted in the first part of this week. It involved $14,900 million of maturing certificates and notes. Of this amount, $5,700 million was held by the Federal Reserve System and offered no problem. The rest was held by the general public.

The Treasury offered in exchange a choice of two issues, both with attractive interest rates. The rates on these exchange offerings were higher than the going market rate of interest for outstanding securities of comparable maturity.

Yet despite these favorable interest rates, holders of $2 billion of the $9,200 million of publicly held maturing issues refused to accept the new issues and demanded cash. This was not a record "attrition," but it was second only to the $2,800 million demand for cash last summer when an exchange issue was floated during the sudden collapse in the Government securities market.

Holders of the maturing issue, including the Federal Reserve System, accepted $11,362 million of a new 1-year certificate bearing 3¾ percent interest and $1,429 million of a new 3-year note bearing 4 percent interest. This left $2,081 million of the maturing issues unexchanged. These securities bore interest rates of 2½ percent and 1⅞ percent, reflecting the rate structure when they were issued a year and more ago.

It was a considerably higher attrition than the Treasury had expected. The result is that the Treasury will need cash to pay off the holders of the maturing issues.

Consequently, it announced that it would sell $1,500 million of 7-month tax-anticipation bills next week. Its general aim and policy is to sell as few of such short-term securities as possible, but it had little choice.

One of the reasons for the partial failure of the issue involved in today's announcement, according to money market sources, was that a large portion of the maturing issue was held by investors, probably corporations, who wanted a shorter term substitute than the Treasury had offered. The shortest of the Treasury's exchange issues carried a maturity of 1 year.

NERVOUSNESS APPARENT

But the underlying reason appears to be a general nervousness in the money market—a nervousness connected with the huge Treasury financing operations required by the $13 billion deficit in the current budget and the possibility of a further deficit in the next budget.

Some investors have switched their money from Treasury and other bonds into stocks as a better hedge against inflation. Some, watching the economy on the rise and expecting heavy demand for credit, look for higher interest rates shortly and thus prefer to hold cash for a while. They are convinced that the Federal Reserve System will use "tight money" policies to check any inflation that may arise.

Mr. Martin told the joint committee today that the inflammable tinder of inflation was lying around in the economy now, even though prices had recently been stable. The country could see a breakout of price increases at any time, he testified.

Mr. Martin said the level of savings in the country was adequate to meet the demand for those savings for investment purposes, thus justifying lower interest rates than now existed. But he said investors, fearing inflation, had been wary of bonds and other fixed-interest securities. Thus the prices of these securities fall, which is the equivalent of a rise in their effective interest rates. Savings, in effect, have flowed elsewhere, including the stock market.

MARTIN VOICES DENIAL

The Federal Reserve chief emphatically denied that the Government must permit a little inflation to help spur faster economic growth and more prosperity. On the contrary, he argued, inflation will have the effect of slowing down growth by bringing in its train periodic recessions.

Today's Treasury announcement symbolized a sort of vicious circle that operates in the financial world. If investors fear inflation, they will not buy long-term Treasury bonds. That means the Treasury must float ever-shorter securities. Because these are virtually the equivalent of cash, and because they often must be sold to the banking system, they tend to expand the Nation's money supply and make the inflation problem—and psychology—worse.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 10, 1959]

HIGH ROAD TO INFLATION

The Government security market—which speaks with authority because it speaks with the public's money—repeated for the benefit of Congress at the close of last week what the President, his Secretary of the Treasury, and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board have been constantly emphasizing in their recent public statements. The market spoke by action rather than in words, but the message was no less clear on that account.

With $14.9 billion in maturities to meet, $9.2 billion of which was in the hands of the public, the Treasury offered the holders a choice of two new issues—a 1-year certificate bearing an interest rate of 3¾ percent and a 3-year note carrying 4 percent. When the public won't scramble for U.S. Treasury issues on terms as attractive as this it bespeaks serious concern for the state of the Nation's financial position. Yet the fact is that holders of the old securities in the amount of $2.1 billion turned down the exchange offer, demanding payment in cash.

But these figures tell only part of the story. Underscoring the market's lack of interest in Governments other than those in the very short-term category is the fact that of $7.2 billion in maturing securities that were turned in by the public (as distinguished from the holdings of the Federal Reserve System) holders of only $1.4 billion, or less than 20 percent, took the 4 percent, 3-year notes in exchange. The other 80 percent-plus demanded the 1-year certificates with their yield of 3¾ percent. That is an increase of 1¼ percent over the interest rate of 2½ percent at which the maturing issue of $9.8 billion in 1-year certificates was sold a year ago.

This means not only that the debt structure has suffered by the replacement of some three-quarters of the outstanding $5.1 billion in notes with short-term obligations, but that the Treasury is forced to go into the market this week with an issue of even shorter maturity in order to raise the $2.1 billion in cash to meet the demands of those who found the exchange offer unacceptable.

The Treasury has been able to market but one long-term issue during the past year, that in the amount of $900 million. It is being forced steadily into the position of having to rely increasingly on the sale of securities for which commercial banks constitute the principal market. And this, as Chairman Martin of the Reserve Board declared last week, is "the high road to monetary inflation."

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I have some further remarks to make, but my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] has been very patient, and I am glad to yield to him at this time.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend for yielding to me. As all of our colleagues know, the Senator from Connecticut is not only a distinguished investment banker of long experience in the field with respect to which he has just spoken, but is also one of the leading members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, a committee before which many of these problems come from time to time.

I think the Senator has made a very able and indeed a brilliant defense from what I would call the orthodox financial point of view of the budget and monetary problem which confronts the 86th Congress. I must say at least to some extent, as the Senator knows, I agree with him, but I should like to develop, if the Senator will be kind enough to indulge me, a few questions which might bring us closer to the issue and which perhaps will reveal some of the differences between the Senator and many of us on this side of the aisle, who are just as much in favor of a balanced budget as my good friend from Connecticut, but who believe that the budget should be balanced at a higher figure than that recommended by the President.

With that preliminary, I ask my friend whether he does not agree that the reason why short-term Federal financing is necessary now is largely the cash deficit resulting from Federal operations during the fiscal year 1959?

Mr. BUSH. No; I would not say that that was the only reason, by any means.

Mr. CLARK. Would not the Senator agree that it is one of the principal reasons?

Mr. BUSH. No. I think the reason goes deeper than that. I gave the reasons in my prepared remarks.

The Treasury is inhibited, for several reasons, from going into the longer term bond market. The Senator may have heard what I said on that subject.

Mr. CLARK. Unfortunately, I arrived a little late. I arrived in the Chamber in time to hear most of the Senator's address, but I did not hear the very beginning.

Mr. BUSH. The Treasury must consider the interest of the whole country, including States, towns, and industries which have to finance in the long-term bond market. If it were necessary to finance a $10 billion deficit, which is probably smaller than we have for this fiscal year, it would absorb so much of the long-term bond market as to make it difficult for other agencies, such as towns, cities, States, and industries, to finance, so that factor must be taken into account.

The second point is that it is very unfortunate, but nevertheless true, that many long-term investors have become afraid of the long term Government bond market because they are afraid of inflation. They are afraid that it will cause a deterioration in the value of their money to such an extent that they do not want to tie it up for 20 years.

Mr. CLARK. I suspect the Senator and I are talking at cross purposes, because of our use of semantics. Let me try again.

If we had had a balanced budget for the fiscal year 1959—

Mr. BUSH. This year?

Mr. CLARK. This year—does not the Senator agree that it would have been far easier for the Treasury to go into the long-term bond market?

Mr. BUSH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Is not that a situation to which we should return at the earliest possible moment—namely, a balanced Federal budget, with perhaps a surplus?

Mr. BUSH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. If we got back to that happy state, would not the Senator agree that then most, if not all, of the Treasury's difficulties in connection with the financing of long-term bonds would evaporate?

Mr. BUSH. Certainly a very great obstacle would have been taken out of the path. It would be difficult to say that all the obstacles would necessarily have evaporated. Certainly, one of the great obstacles would be out of the way.

Mr. CLARK. I think we are reaching substantial agreement.

Mr. BUSH. We are agreed on the point which the Senator has raised.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator would agree—and if he does not, I know he will say so—that we should be doing our level best, both in the White House and here in the Congress, to get a balanced budget at the earliest possible moment and, if possible, a surplus which, to some extent, could be applied upon the debt.

If we could arrive at that happy state, in all likelihood, it would then be possible for the Treasury to refund our present Federal debt on a long-term basis. I believe the Senator would agree that that would be a wise thing to do, and would have no inflationary tendencies, but rather would be likely to have deflationary tendencies, because, as the Senator has so well said, it would take money out of the market and put it into the safe-deposit box. Does the Senator agree?

Mr. BUSH. Yes. I agree that the happy state to which the Senator refers is one which we should use every effort to attain; and if we did so, it would greatly facilitate financing in the long-term bond market. It might even enable us, as some of the securities mature, to extend them, which would be a very desirable thing to do. The shorter the debt, the nearer we come to monetizing the debt, and making it the same as money in our pockets—interest-bearing money. So I agree with the Senator that it would be a desirable thing to do, and would have an anti-inflationary effect.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator agree that we could arrive at that happy result just about as well with a Federal budget balanced at $80 billion, or even $83 billion, as we could with a Federal budget balanced at $77 billion?

Mr. BUSH. I am not sure about that, but I should say that the important thing would be the balancing of the budget, because with a balanced budget we would not have to go into the banking system, even under these circumstances. So the Senator is probably correct.

Mr. CLARK. If my friend will turn his mind back to what he said with respect to the inflationary effect of short term borrowing, as I recall, the Senator said that the creation of bank deposits was very little different from printing money.

Mr. BUSH. It is exactly the same.

Mr. CLARK. I am in accord with my friend in that regard; but I should like to ask him this: Is it not a subject on which judgments of qualified people may well differ from time to time, as to how large the monetary supply should be? I am including bank deposits as well as cash.

To amplify a little further before the Senator answers, is not that, in many respects, the reason why we have the Federal Reserve Board, namely, to determine to what extent the supply of available money is adequate to stabilize the economy and yet permit the kind of expansion which I am sure the Senator from Connecticut is just as eager to see as I am?

Mr. BUSH. The Senator has asked me two or three different questions. Taking the last one first, I should say that the existence of the Federal Reserve System is, of course, of vital importance in connection with the whole question of credit and money. The Federal Reserve Board has a great deal of control over credit, and, because of that fact, some lesser control over money.

Having heard the testimony of the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, as I believe the Senator also did—in fact, I am sure the Senator was present when he testified before our committee——

Mr. CLARK. Last year?

Mr. BUSH. No; this year.

Mr. CLARK. I do not believe the Chairman has been before the committee this year.

Mr. BUSH. I stand corrected. He was before the Joint Economic Committee, on which I serve. He testified that he was very much concerned about the subject I have been discussing. He made a trip around the world, and when he returned he made a speech in Chicago on or about December 16, in which he expressed the gravest concern about the possibilities of further deficit financing.

Much to his astonishment, he found in the Far East—in Thailand and other distant countries in that area—a growing concern about the credit of the Government of the United States. He even spoke of our inability or our unwillingness to balance our budget and get our fiscal affairs in shape as an evidence to the people in those distant countries of moral deterioration of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. I am not quarreling with the Senator.

Mr. BUSH. No. We are working together. So long as the Senator brought up the subject of the Federal Reserve Board, I desired to make that comment about Chairman Martin. I hope the Senator will agree with me that he is a man of great responsibility, and a very able man. Most of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle have paid him that compliment. So I think we should give very great weight to his views on these important questions, because his responsibilities in this area are very great, indeed.

Mr. CLARK. I share my colleague's high regard for Mr. Martin.

But we get back to my question as to whether at any given time the amount of money which should be in the system does not involve complicated factors of judgment, and that it is impossible to say categorically that X billion dollars would constitute a correct monetary supply 20 years ago, today, or 5 years from now.

Mr. BUSH. Yes. I am glad the Senator has come back to that point. I have tried to point out the danger of increasing the monetary supply without increasing productivity.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUSH. In the illustration I have used, I have merely tried to show the danger of monetary inflation to the order of $10 billion—a purely hypothetical case—but without any increase in productivity. That would merely swell the supply of money with which to buy some of the things that are in existence. Therefore we come back to the question of productivity.

Mr. CLARK. So that at any given time, in determining how much money should be available in the system, we must also consider, must we not, the extent to which our gross national product is meeting the potential productive capability of our economic system? Before the Senator answers that question, I should like to elaborate my question a little. Where we have a situation, as we do at the present time, with a large increase in unemployment, where the rate of productivity in many durable goods industries is far below capacity, and where we do not have the classic situation of too much money chasing too few goods, all those factors must be taken into consideration in determining whether it is wise or unwise to increase the monetary supply by issuing short-term Government securities.

Mr. BUSH. I am sorry. I lost the trend of the Senator's thought.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield further, perhaps it would be better if I made a brief statement. Then the Senator could comment on it. In that way I will not harass him further.

Mr. BUSH. Provided I do not lose my right to the floor, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK. With that understanding, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to suggest for the RECORD, with respect to the Senator's address, that we should not assert, in a vacuum, that an increase in the monetary system is naturally and inevitably inflationary. That is only true if we get into a situation where there is too much money chasing too few goods. Such a situation would inevitably tend to drive prices up.

That is not the situation today, and that has not been the situation since the very beginning of the recession, back in the summer of 1957. We still have a vast number of unemployed, and we still have productivity at a far lower level than our plant is capable of producing. Therefore we must take that factor into consideration before assuming that we are going to have a drastic inflationary effect from the further financing of the Federal debt on a short-term basis.

I hasten to add that I agree with my friend from Connecticut that we ought to cut to the minimum the short-term financing of the Federal debt. The best way to do it, of course, is to balance the current budget. I should like to point out that when the Senator says if we put 7 percent more money into our monetary system that automatically we cut the buying power and increase the cost of living of indiividuals living on pensions and on other returns which cannot fluctuate, that that is an oversimplification.

I might agree that if we pumped 7 percent more money into the system, there would probably be an inflationary effect on the stock market, because the stocks are there and they are relatively fixed in number of shares. That is the situation where we have too much money chasing too few goods. However, if we have a deficit in the number of automobiles available, if we have a deficit in the amount of steel that is being produced, and so forth, I do not believe that an increase in the monetary system is in and of itself necessarily going to result in depreciating the value of the returns of individuals living on fixed incomes.

It will do that only if prices should go up. Prices will not go up unless we get into a situation where we have too much money chasing too few goods, with no productive capacity available to increase the number of goods.

This is perhaps another minor point in the Senator's remarks. Substantially, I believe, we are in accord. However, it seemed to me that I should make this point because I thought it was important to bring it to the attention of my friend from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know of his deep interest in this subject. He has joined me on a bill which is designed to say in effect that full employment or maximum employment is more easily attained with a relatively stable price level than with prices going up all the time. Perhaps that is an oversimplification of the stated purpose of the bill, but that is approximately its purpose. I know that the Senator from Pennsylvania is sincerely interested in the measure and in any other measures which will curb inflation.

The difference, I believe, between the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself revolves about the fact that the Senator feels that if we increase Government spending to, if I understand his recent remark, approximately $83 billion, it will automatically have the effect of producing more taxes from the tax structure which we now have, and, therefore, we will have a better chance of balancing our budget at $83 billion than we would on the President's plan of balancing the budget at $77 billion.

If I have not correctly interpreted the statement of my friend from Pennsylvania, I shall be glad to yield to him so that he may correct me.

Mr. CLARK. I believe that my friend has completely, although inadvertently, misunderstood or misinterpreted my position when he says, for the purpose of argument, that if we put $6 billion into defense, into schools, into urban renewal, and into water resources development, it would automatically result in our getting more revenue. I hope so, but I do not know. I believe we should do it anyway, because I believe our national security requires it. I believe our educational system requires it. I believe our sense of compassion needs the Housing Act, which is designed to supply a decent home for every American who requires it. So what in effect we would be doing would be to take the $6 billion out of the private sector economy and putting it into the public sector economy, where, to my way of thinking, the need is greater. I believe we need more schools, and we need them a great deal more than we need Cadillacs or Coca Cola. So whether doing that would increase the Federal revenue, because the economy would expand, I do not know. I hope it would, but I feel that it is important for us to balance the budget by increasing Federal revenues through closing tax loopholes to be sure we do not run into deficit spending.

Mr. BUSH. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will bear with me, I shall read to him a little lecture in the form of an article entitled "Economic Needs and Resources," which was published in the Guaranty Survey of February 1959. I think it comes to grips with the very subject the Senator has just raised. I am very glad to have the opportunity to read the article into the RECORD, because I myself believe it contains very sound doctrine. It discusses the question of economic needs, what those needs are, and so forth. This is the article:

ECONOMIC "NEEDS" AND RESOURCES

The Federal budget for the coming fiscal year, balanced at a figure nearly $4 billion below this year's estimated expenditures, raised quick protest in some congressional circles. The President's proposals were termed unrealistic and impractical, apparently on the ground that they called for measures which the President knew Congress would not adopt.

Queries could be raised concerning the realism of blaming the President for Congress' expected refusal to follow his recommendations. Yet the criticism is realistic enough in the sense that it points to the crucial question in the near-term fiscal outlook. This question is whether the President will be able to prevent Congress from incurring another large Federal deficit by voting higher expenditures than he recommends and by failing to provide the revenue needed to meet the expenditures voted.

TWO BUDGET APPROACHES

Ever since the November elections, it has been widely predicted that the new Congress will be a free-spending Congress. Yet most of the Members to whom this label is applied evidently dislike being called free spenders and apparently do not regard themselves in that light. In their own eyes, they are merely recognizing and trying to provide for the minimum requirements or the essential needs of the Government, the economy, and the people.

These needs are thought of in terms of national security and personal welfare, objectives whose desirability is obvious. Are not national defense, health, education, and standards of living more important than a balanced budget? Such needs tend to be regarded as absolute imperatives that must be met by one means or another, and practical considerations like balanced budgets, tolerable tax burdens, economic incentives, and stable prices tend to be brushed aside as of secondary importance. As one spokesman put it not long ago, "The choice of our rich, productive country is no longer, 'How much can we afford?' Today, Americans must consider, 'Can we afford not to meet our national needs?' "

It is the practical consideration that the President refuses to lose sight of. In his public statement on the budget, Mr. Eisenhower reminded the people that "in the Government, as in your family, it is not possible to do all that everyone would like to do—all at the same time. A budget is a way to schedule priorities." And in his budget message he told Congress that "desirability alone is not a sound criterion for adding to Federal responsibilities."

The President was not thinking in terms of fixed needs but of the relative priority of desirable objectives against a background of limited resources. His conception of the budget stands out in interesting contrast to that of the Senate's majority leader, who commented: "The philosophy of this budget misses the point. It is based on the assumption that there is some magic figure into which the budget should be forced, like putting a man into a strait jacket." The point is, of course, that the needs come first, and the resources (in this case, the budget) must be stretched to meet them.

WHAT ARE ECONOMIC NEEDS?

If this attitude prevails, it will be merely one more in the long series of examples of the type of thinking that is gradually destroying the value of money. It is the type of thinking that has been largely instrumental in throwing the Federal budget out of balance in all but 5 of the last 28 fiscal years and in giving America the 50-cent dollar. It is the type of thinking that is causing both Americans and foreigners to wonder whether the dollar really deserves to be ranked among the world's hard currencies, as it has been since the foundation of the Republic.

What, in reality, are economic needs? A little sober reflection is enough to show that the term is meaningless except as it is related to the available resources. Needs, quite irrespective of their supposed essentiality, cannot possibly be met unless the resources are present. The very word is a misnomer when applied to economic objectives. The question for individuals and nations to answer is not what they think they need (which really means what they would like to have) but what they prefer within the limits of what they can afford.

No economic pill has ever proved more difficult to swallow than this simple fact. Since the beginning of history, men have been impatient with the limitations of their economic environment and have cast about for ways of escaping from them. Individuals have bankrupted or incriminated themselves and nations have wrecked their currencies in the futile effort to meet needs that exceeded their resources.

Yet the effort continues on a worldwide scale, and it is by no means confined to fiscal matters. Because workers need higher wages, unions are protected and encouraged by law until they become powerful enough to exact wage increases exceeding the rise in productivity. The result is a wage-price spiral that impoverishes individuals and institutions with fixed incomes, while the increase in real wages is limited to the rise in productivity, precisely as it always has been.

When monetary authorities try to combat the inflationary effects of excessive wage increases and budgetary deficits, they find themselves hampered because workers need continuous full employment. The benefits of the technological revolution in agriculture are withheld from consumers, while surpluses of farm products reach gigantic proportions, because farmers need a predetermined level of income. Housing shortages occur because tenants need low rents, while new living quarters are priced beyond the reach of low-income receivers because families need adequate housing.

THE EASY-MONEY EXAMPLE

Nowhere is the endeavor to stretch resources to meet needs seen more clearly, and nowhere are its effects more unfortunate, than in the field of credit. In private as well as public finance, the basic problem is to establish an order of priority—to apportion the available resources among the competing claimants. The business world is crowded with applicants for credit, would-be borrowers who wish to use a share of the limited supply of productive resources, human and material. Obviously, not all these applicants can be accommodated. The function of credit is to place resources at the disposal of those who give the best promise of productive use; in other words, to select the relatively few potential successes from the many inevitable failures.

Since the supply of labor and capital is limited, while the number of persons who would like to use them is large, it is unavoidable that many applicants must be disappointed. This is most conspicuously true at a time of very active business when the outlook for earnings is exceptionally favorable and most companies are seeking to expand their operations, while many new enterprises are coming into existence. At such times, credit is said to be tight.

Actually, the tightness of credit is merely the outward manifestation of a superabundant demand for the limited supply of productive resources. But persons whose attention is fixed upon needs rather than resources conclude that something has gone wrong with the credit system so that business cannot get the credit it needs. Cries of capital shortage and inadequate financial facilities are heard. The banks, the monetary authorities, and the Government all receive a share of the blame. Efforts are frequently made to establish new financing agencies or to place governmental funds at the disposal of private borrowers. At the very least, political and popular pressure is brought to bear upon the central banking system to provide commercial banks with more money.

Insofar as such efforts succeed, the effects are inflationary. Increasing the supply of money does not increase the supply of goods and services available. It merely swells an already excessive demand and forces prices higher. Because money is used to buy goods and services, it seems impossible for many persons to avoid the specious conclusion that the more money the people have, the more goods and services they can buy.

This same fallacy is responsible for the difficulties that most underdeveloped countries are experiencing in their efforts to achieve quick industrialization. There is no question as to the needs of these countries. Needs, however, do not create resources. The capital shortage that is almost universally complained of in such areas is only another name for a lack of resources due partly to a low level of output and partly to a general unwillingness to borrow on terms that would attract foreign lenders. So, in a futile endeavor to make their own meager resources do double duty in meeting needs for consumption and investment, these countries compound their difficulties by expanding their money supply and adding an inflationary problem to their underdevelopment problem.

Whatever form it may take, the attempt to fit resources to needs instead of fitting needs to resources means trying to get more out of an economy than it is capable of providing. Rich countries and poor countries are alike in desiring more than they have, but this is not the same thing as demanding more than can be supplied. The only way to get more is by the gradual process of saving and capital formation. The manufacture of purchasing power by fiscal and monetary manipulations offers no short cuts; instead of creating goods and services, this merely destroys money. It is curious that such an old lesson should have to be relearned in the middle of the 20th century.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUSH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think the New York bank letter contains two serious fallacies which have been repeated so often that, unfortunately, some of the American people are beginning to believe them.

First, it sets up the strawman of the deficit and says: If you spend more money for needed programs you will have a deficit. Then you will have inflation.

I can stand on the floor of the Senate every day, all day, from now until Easter, and so can all my friends on this side of the aisle, and say we are not going to have a deficit. The New York bank, nevertheless, will keep on saying we will have a deficit. Of course, if the premise is correct, the conclusion is sound. But the premise is a fallacy. This we must keep on saying, until we finally convince and prove to the public that we are not going to have a deficit.

The second fallacy lies in the talk about limited resources and the crushing burden of taxation, and how, if we do not look out, the whole incentive of the free enterprise system will be destroyed. That, too, is a fallacy. The fact is that we are taking far less of our gross national product in Federal taxation now than was the case at the end of World War II. I have placed those figures in the RECORD time after time. The national debt is a far smaller proportion of our gross national product today than it was at the end of World War II.

If we could only sweep away these fallacies which are repeated over and over again in the snow job which is being done by the New York banks, the Madison Avenue public relations agencies, and the newspapers of the country, who set up the strawman, and then preach the doctrine that we are wild-eyed spenders and inflationists, who are crushing the people with an unfair burden of taxation; and that, therefore, we must not have new school systems, we must not have adequate national defense, we must not have a decent home for every American—if we could get away from such fallacies, we would be better off.

Mr. BUSH. It is a question of interpretation of a question of judgment as to what is adequate and what is proper.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator happens to believe, in the matter of urban renewal, for instance, as to which he is certainly well versed and is one of the ardent proponents, that $400 million a year is not enough.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUSH. He would like the amount to be $600 million.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUSH. He believes that even that amount would be a minimum. Possibly an amount like that could be used. But where the Senator from Pennsylvania differs with his critics, including myself, on this issue is that we think, in matters such as these, it is necessary to adjust them, considering the whole picture. We cannot pick out, or let one Senator pick out, one thing, and another Senator pick out another, and each have his way about these high figures.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BUSH. Otherwise, the Senator from Pennsylvania would not have a $83 billion budget, but a budget of $93 billion or $100 billion.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator is going to refer to me in that way, I ask him to yield.

Mr. BUSH. I will yield. What the Senator has just said revolves around the question of what is adequate.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUSH. I might observe that in these very critical times, when the credit of our Government is of the utmost importance to all the people and to the free world—and every Senator, I think, will agree with that—we dare not take chances with that credit; we dare not let it deteriorate; we dare not build an unsound economy, such as we would have, in my judgment, if we did what the Senator from Pennsylvania wanted to do, namely, spend $83 billion on the assumption that to do so would produce taxes of an equivalent amount.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to my friend from Connecticut, for the second time in the last 5 minutes, that I never made that assumption. I said we ought to increase revenues by closing loopholes. They are there to be closed, and the Senator from Connecticut knows they are there. I never said that by spending an additional $6 billion more Federal revenues would be received. I hope they might be, but I do not know.

Mr. BUSH. If the Senator can produce loopholes which are really loopholes, and they ought to be closed, I think Congress ought to close them.

Mr. CLARK. We have already done so, in the RECORD, five times since this session of Congress convened. A bill will be referred to committee by the first of March.

I do not want to have the last word, so I shall leave the floor. My thanks to my good friend for having been so gracious in yielding to me.

Mr. BUSH. I appreciate the Senator's interest in this matter. I do not know how many bills have been introduced, but I cannot keep up with every single bill which has been introduced. However, I am glad the Senator from Pennsylvania may be offering some solution to our problems by introducing measures which may improve our tax income.

Mr. President, I may be mistaken—in which case I hope some of my friends will correct me on tomorrow, if they are not here now—but I have not yet seen the Democratic Party's leadership itself introduce, as it so often does, any bills which come to grips with the tax situation in respect to closing any loopholes or meeting revenue deficits which now exist. I should like to see the Democratic Party's leadership do so, because I believe such measures have an important bearing on all these matters.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article entitled "Playing With Economic Disaster," which was written by David Lawrence and was published in the Washington Evening Star.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAYING WITH ECONOMIC DISASTER—VOTE TO INCREASE HOUSING FUNDS FEARED AS FIRST STEP TOWARD INFLATION DEBACLE

(By David Lawrence)

An economic debacle is in the making. Can it be avoided? Both Houses of Congress took on Wednesday a step that may hasten its coming. The American people may learn sooner than anybody has believed possible that a blunder was made in the election last November by giving the Democratic Party control of Congress.

For the threat now is that, if the budget is unbalanced, higher taxes for everybody will have to be enacted. And if the revenues to balance the higher spending begun by the Democrats are not to be collected by the Government, then the American people are in for an era of inflation that could send the cost of living upward and eventually bring the dollar down to a 10-cent purchasing power. This would mean international danger. For the weakness in the American dollar would have a far reaching effect on the currencies of Western nations.

The vote in the House and Senate this week on the Federal housing program is significant. It was a bold defiance of budget-balancing and an invitation to higher and higher taxes. President Eisenhower has said frankly that if the budget is unbalanced, he will demand the passage of higher taxes.

The Democrats lined up almost solidly for budget-busting and disregarded the inflationary dangers. Of the 282 Democrats in the House, 257 voted to authorize $300 million to provide direct loans to veterans for housing whenever they cannot borrow from private institutions. Only two Democrats voted with 121 Republicans against the measure. Just why any group of American citizens should be given such an advantage—especially in these days when there are outcries about "second-class citizenship" and discrimination—is not clear to anybody except the politicians. They think the relatively small number of veterans in the country who can't borrow from private loan institutions is a big enough vote to go after in disregard of the interests of all other voters. But that's selfish and misguided politics.

Democrats cast 51 of the 58 votes in the Senate against the administration's housing program, and in favor of more money than the budget provided. Only 7 Democrats voted with 25 Republicans to support the President's budget. This shows plainly that, in both Houses of Congress, the Democratic Party has become the party of the spenders and looks with scorn on the savers.

There are several bills coming up for consideration in Congress involving the expenditure of more billions than the budget provides. If the Democrats think the country is back of them, they'll make a shambles of the President's budget. There is a feeling on Capitol Hill that the country doesn't care and that the sky is the limit on public spending if a welfare label can be pinned on it. Indeed, there are many so-called economists who say that the more spent, the more the country will prosper. No private individual has ever been able to get by on a doctrine that favors spending more than one earns or borrowing more than one can pay back.

The only reason the Government can borrow large sums of money while its tax receipts are down is because people have confidence in the ultimate capacity of the Treasury to pay back what it borrows. Once this confidence is shaken and Government bonds depreciate in value, the Government has to pay higher and higher interest rates. The price of everything else goes up correspondingly.

The biggest worry in America today is how long public confidence will stand up against the spending orgy that has now begun in Congress. Doubtless, the labor unions will begin a new series of demands for higher wages if prices of the articles the workers buy start going up. It's an inflationary cycle often called the wage-price spiral. Before it runs its course, nations generally do not realize the perils ahead. Only when the shock comes and it is almost too late to apply the brakes is there a popular revulsion.

Many countries in the world have had what is termed a "runaway inflation." Before it reaches that stage, the argument is made that a collapse can't happen. Today there are many economists who are arguing that inflation has been stopped. But what happened on Wednesday of this week is proof that, despite all the debate about how inflation is being held in check, an overwhelming majority of both Houses of Congress—particularly the Democratic Party—now votes to ignore the President's plea for a balanced budget and to plunge the country into more and more deficit spending.

Nothing would please the Kremlin so much as to see the economy of the United States weakened from within by unsound fiscal policies. For an inflationary trend would make necessary even bigger spending to pay higher prices for the same armament planned many months ago.

This week was a critical one in American history, and the die seems to have been cast by the Democratic Party in favor of inflation, which means a further devaluation of the purchasing power of the dollar.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, an article entitled "The Ruinous Race," which appears today in the Wall Street Journal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RUINOUS RACE

Though letters backing the President are beginning to reach Washington, the inescapable impression is still one of considerable apathy toward his intensive struggle against inflation.

Why?

The administration itself may be partly responsible for the indifference, because of its attitude in the recent past. After a big start toward cutting the cost of Government, it began to let budgetary discipline slide and spending ascend; among other things it contributed to the staggering $13 billion deficit for this fiscal year. Now that the administration has come out strongly once again for fiscal soundness, some people may wonder if it means to keep up the fight.

Then too, the victory of many "liberals" in November may have left the impression that those who stand against inflation are but a hopeless, helpless remnant. We happen to think that a dubious interpretation of the election, but the feeling is understandable.

Beyond that, the Nation has been brainwashed for much of the past 25 years by the pseudo-Keynesian and worse economics preached and practiced in Washington. It has been drilled into people's minds that inflation is not a monster but a pal, that the Government can spend forever without the people paying, that the very notion of balancing a Federal budget is old hat.

And the inflationists can make a superficially telling point. Many people do seem to have benefited by inflation; that is to say, there are more people whose incomes have roughly kept pace than there are old and retired people whose social security payments and savings have been shot to pieces by inflation. Rationally, the point is extremely feeble, since it should not be difficult for today's jobholder to see what continued inflation will do to his own retirement.

In any case, all these causes seem to have generated an air of defeatism about inflation—a feeling that it is a fact and nobody is going to stop it. That attitude is disturbing enough. What is even more so is that such defeatism seems to be causing its own sinister reaction in the feverish hope of many people that they can race with inflation and win.

Some people perhaps can, for a while. But let us not kid ourselves as to what we are talking about. The kind of inflation that the liberal spenders in Congress would saddle this country with would be no creeping inflation. Their plans would pile deficit upon deficit, and that would mean full-blown inflation.

What we are talking about is not just the danger of a little more erosion of the dollar over the years. We are talking about the danger of an eventual financial collapse. And there are not many people who can beat that rap. Even to toy with such a risk to our future is madness.

That is why Treasury Secretary Anderson is speaking these days in language like this:

"(Economic) growth requires capital formation, through savings and investment. As a consequence, we should meet our expenditures out of current revenues in prosperous times. A current deficit and the fear of future deficits can keep people from saving because of possible loss of these savings to inflation. If we ever reach the point where people believe that to speculate is safe but to save is to gamble then we are indeed in trouble."

And this man of deliberate speech, hardly a man to conjure up hobgoblins, warns distinctly of the threat to our habits of saving, our financial institutions, our monetary system—warns, in other words, of financial collapse.

That is why Commerce Secretary Strauss pleads with businessmen to shun additional Federal spending proposals even if your industry or your locality is an intended beneficiary.

That is why President Eisenhower is repeatedly asking all the people to avoid the ruinous route of free republics of the ages past, the route of deficit financing, of inflation, of taxes ever rising, until all initiative and self-reliant enterprise are destroyed.

And that is why the country had better start shaking off its inflation apathy and defeatism and join the struggle of today which, to use Lincoln's words, is not altogether for today but for a vast future also.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a memorandum entitled "The Causes and Implications of the Recent Outflow of Gold From the United States." The memorandum was prepared in the offices of the Federal Reserve Board, by one of its economists, Mr. Arthur Marget.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CAUSES AND IMPLICATIONS OF THE RECENT OUTFLOW OF GOLD FROM THE UNITED STATES

The recent outflow of gold from the United States is not what some sensational news commentators declared it to be: a flight from the dollar. The conception of such a flight implies that foreign holders of deposits in the United States and other short-term dollar assets have been converting these dollar assets into gold. But this is precisely what has not been happening. On the contrary, in the year 1958, there was an actual increase of $1 billion in the liquid dollar holdings by foreigners and international agencies above the level prevailing in 1957.

The explanation of the outflow of $2.3 billion of gold in 1958 must therefore be sought elsewhere than in a supposed flight from the dollar. It is to be sought, specifically, in changes in the factors comprising our overall balance of payments, which led to outpayments to foreigners in an amount considerably in excess of the inpayments by foreigners to us.

Of these movements in 1958, as compared with 1957, the most striking was a sharp decline in our exports—by almost a fifth. It is being suggested that this sharp drop in our exports is due specifically to a growing lack of competitiveness of U.S. products in the international market, as a result of steadily increasing demand-pull and cost-push pressures in the United States. Of all the implications of the recent gold outflow, this is the one whose validity it is most important to examine.

It should be said at once that we must not dismiss the possibility of our someday running into serious balance-of-payments difficulties as a result of a failure to adopt policies—particularly fiscal and monetary policies—of an adequate degree of restraint. It was always wrong to suggest, as some have suggested in the past, that a country with the immense internal market of the United States need never concern itself seriously with the consequences of internal inflationary developments for its balance of payments. It is even more dangerous to make such a suggestion now. In the past, the balance-of-payments consequences of internal inflationary developments in the United States were sometimes held off because so many of our trading partners were inflating more than we were. But with the development of sounder fiscal and monetary policies abroad—a further milestone in this direction has been set by the recent steps taken by European countries with respect to the external convertibility of their currencies—it is quite clear that we neither can nor should count on inflation abroad to save us from the balance-of-payments consequences of inflation here at home. We should, on the contrary, regard the balance-of-payments consequences of inflationary developments as providing a further sanction against a failure to live up fully to our responsibilities with respect to the restraining of inflationary forces in this country.

Having made clear, I trust, that I regard this conclusion as being easily the most important policy implication of the balance-of-payments developments we were summarizing, I should like to add that this is by no means the same thing as saying that I believe that the sharp decline in our exports last year was the specific result of our having priced ourselves out of the market as the result of a failure to keep inflationary forces under control. That we are currently pricing ourselves out of the market in the field of cotton, for example, seems to me quite clear: But it seems to me equally clear that this is the result of a wrong pricing policy in the specific field of cotton exports, rather than of a general upward movement of costs and prices internally. It seems to me clear, also, that it is difficult to speak with assurance of a widespread lack of competitiveness of U.S. exports at a time when that competitiveness is not even being allowed to be tested as a result of discriminatory restrictions against U.S. exports. (In the case of coal, for example, it is quite clear that our coal is cheaper in Europe than a considerable part of European coal production is; yet at the moment Germany, which is commonly cited as a country that is outcompeting us in all fields, is currently placing restrictions on American coal imports, of a kind that has led our Government to protest vigorously.)

It is, indeed, impossible to get a fair perspective with respect to the role played in our export decline last year by an alleged tendency, of a fairly general character, to price ourselves out of the market, unless we remember one central fact about that export decline: Namely, that the big drop in our exports to other industrial countries, in particular, followed a big bulge in those exports, which, as we can now see, can hardly have been expected to be sustained at those levels indefinitely. One reason for the bulge was the aftermath of Suez; another was the overimporting by countries (Japan, France, and India are examples) that had allowed inflationary forces to get out of control internally; a third was a vigorous boom abroad, even in countries in which internal inflation was not rampant, which later simply tapered off, and in a sense lived on the inventories it had built up from goods that comprised a considerable part of our export bulge.

Let us say, then, that with both bulge and corresponding drop in our exports behind us, we are in a position now to see how our balance of payments—and the international movements of gold and dollars which adjustments in the balance of payments inevitably entail—will develop in an environment which, we hope, will be free of abnormal developments of a seriously disturbing character. In that kind of environment there is less excuse than ever for failing to live up to our responsibilities in the fiscal and monetary fields. I should like only to emphasize again that I do not for a moment dissent from the proposition that slackness in these fields could cause us serious balance of payments difficulties; and that this is an additional reason for making sure that our fiscal and monetary policies evidence a sufficient degree of rigor in the period immediately ahead of us.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, today it is my privilege to make some factual replies to the statement made yesterday by the distinguished Senator who now occupies the Chair; I refer to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], whose subject yesterday was civil defense program expenditures by the United States and the provisions therefor in the budget. I regret that I did not have the privilege of hearing the distinguished Senator's remarks yesterday.

Mr. President, I always believe in emphasizing the positive. Accordingly, I shall handle this subject in that way, for I think it is the best way to advance our joint interests.

First of all, Mr. President, by way of emphasizing the positive, let me say that I assume that the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] is just as much interested as I am in the defense and security of the country, and is just as sincere as I am in his views on this subject, although our views may, at least in some respects, differ. I also certainly join the Senator from Ohio in the idea that any review of our defense posture—whether civil or otherwise—is more than amply warranted by the critical situation the country faces and by the fact that all questions of defense are in a state of flux.

The Banking and Currency Committee, of which I am a member, has partial legislative jurisdiction of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization; and I shall do my part in taking another look at that entire organization and what it is accomplishing and doing. I hope very much that the Armed Services Committee, which has legislative jurisdiction over the strictly civil-defense functions, will do the same.

However, I believe it important—again, as I say, in emphasizing the positive—first, to analyze the record of this agency, in order to see better where it is going and where it ought to go; and, second, not to do something which perhaps the Senator from Ohio did not realize he was doing—and I deeply believe this—namely, not to take an action which might cause the many, many persons who now are participating in the civil-defense program to have doubt as to whether they are doing anything worth while.

I notice that my colleague paid tribute to the volunteer workers—the thousands of good, loyal, patriotic American men and women who, as he put it, are volunteers, and who in the past have volunteered for the service of the civil defense. Nevertheless, when one makes a sweeping statement that what we are doing really is not worth anything, such a statement naturally puts such persons in doubt as to whether all their activities are worth while. For example, my colleague said that the civil defense has no function in such a situation; he was referring to possible sneak attacks upon the United States or to a limited shooting war or what we now call a brushfire war which might occur at some point in the world.

I also notice that my colleague asked a rhetorical question, as follows:

In this space age, with jetplanes exceeding the speed of sound, and with the dread portent of intercontinental ballistic missiles and rockets soaring into space toward targets continents apart, what justification may a public servant dedicated to the welfare and defense of this Nation find in voting to continue the vast expense of a civil defense program geared to a bygone era?

I would agree with my colleague, Mr. President, that we should not vote anything for a civil-defense program geared to a bygone era. But I could not agree with my colleague that we should not support this civil-defense program right now. On the contrary, we should support it because it is absolutely essential, and because it is something we have. So I should like to analyze my attitude on that point.

First of all, in dealing with this matter, we are not dealing with only a few persons. Four million Americans are volunteering for the civil defense, and are devoting their energies and their time and attention to it.

In addition, I believe we should consider the stakes involved. They are almost too horrible to mention. In a recent "Report on a Study of Non-Military Defense" published by the Rand Corp. which was widely publicized in national magazines and newspapers, it was estimated that we might suffer more than 100 million casualties from fallout, explosions, blasts and the other horrors of destruction resulting from all-out attack by atom and hydrogen weapons.

Under the circumstances of such dread eventualities and of the participation of so many million Americans who are engaged in this program, and who have been engaged in it for some years, we must examine, first, the validity of the effort itself and, second, the proposed expenditure, in the budget, of $86,970,000. I emphasize that the $86,970,000 is to be compared with the $41 billion which we are spending for military activities of one kind or another.

In connection with our analysis of the civil-defense activities and of the very horrible possibilities inherent in such an attack upon continental United States, let us remember a number of things. In this case I draw on my own experience in the field of foreign affairs, with which I have been associated ever since I came to the Congress in early 1947.

In the first place, the eventuality of such an attack upon the continental United States is now an established element in all military assessments and in all our strategic planning, for it is now rather generally accepted that if we were to become subjected to the horrors of another world war, the target area would be no less than the whole United States. There seems to be no question about that. That fact in itself represents a new and a revolutionary concept with respect to any world war, for in World Wars I and II the enemy "never laid a hand on us," in any real sense, to use a boxing term; the closest the enemy got to us was Hawaii.

In discussing the civil defense program and the present situation, I believe we should draw an object lesson from what occurred in California after the Japanese made their sneak attack at Pearl Harbor.

There was real alarm and real concern in California, to such an extent that the problem of social organization was a very real one, and there was felt a very grave lack of organized cadre of trained people who could even give to other human beings that reassurance which comes from a knowledge that at least somebody knows what should be done, even if it is very little, and where people should go, when they are threatened with an imminent invasion, as was thought at that time.

I think that event provided a very important object lesson in what to me seems to be the fundamental aspect of this whole civil defense picture, and that is we have got to have it. We have got to have it for the morale of this country. We have got to have it, whatever may be its small capability for helping in the situation of having a sneak attack upon our country with intercontinental ballistic missiles or whatever else in the way of weapons may eventuate. We have got to have a feeling that at least somebody is around who knows what to do, even if it is not too much, but that at least there is some organized way of approaching the situation in a local community.

So I deeply feel that the civil defense organization is essential. The minute that is said, I do not think an expenditure of $86 million is out of line for the continental United States in any major national effort of this character.

It might interest my colleague from Ohio to know why I took on this assignment. I took it on with the greatest good feeling toward my friend, and I think my colleague will find that feeling demonstrated as I go along. I took it on only in order to utilize the issue which he posed in order to further the enlightenment of our people by a discussion of this subject and by presenting the other side of the question, which, after all, is our American way. As a lawyer, I can never resist taking pride in the fact that is the way the American system works. But I had yet another reason, which I think will interest my colleague from Ohio.

I had what I think was the honor to carry the burden of the debate in opposing, in the first year I came to the Senate, 1957, a very sharp cut in the appropriation for the U.S. Information Agency. At that time, though I was a freshman, I stood almost alone in arguing, against the prestige of the majority leader himself, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], who was determined to materially cut the appropriation for the U.S. Information Agency. I thought he was dead wrong, Mr. President, and I fought against it.

In the same spirit, I speak today, because in the case of the USIA, there too was an agency which could have many holes punched in it. This was wrong with it. That was wrong with it. It was not really doing the job—as if any one agency of the Government could persuade the people of the world in the grim struggle in which we are engaged with the Communists.

What I fear, when once we begin to dismantle an agency of that character, when once we begin to let personnel go, and permit a slackening in its organization, is that it takes years to get it organized again. That fact was demonstrated in the case of the USIA, because we snapped back almost down to the previous level of appropriations, once we had punished, not the Agency, but ourselves, by reducing its personnel and activities. Once we recognized the Agency was essential, once we recognized that it was, indeed, indispensable to the total posture of the defense of this country, we restored it. I said at that time, even if we were wasting some money, even if its activities were bad, even if its personnel was not good, we should not dismantle the Agency, because we could not do it in the interest of our own national security.

I think the same idea applies in the case of civil defense. This is an essential element in the national security of the country, because, by submitting to the temptation of chopping it down because we do not like it or because it does not do this, that, or the other thing economically or well, we could not put it back into proper organization for years. It would take an indispensable amount of time to bring it back to what it was, as indeed would have to be done in the national interest.

The Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization today has a budget request for $86 million, which is an increase from its previous budget of $45 million—$45,285,000 as against $86,970,000. But in the request of $86,970,000 is an item of $21 million to carry out legislation which Congress adopted last year for sharing with the States and cities the cost of civil defense personnel and for providing Geiger counters to States and cities for use in determining radioactive fallout. The $21 million item represents only one-third of what the Congress authorized for this type of expenditure. Congress authorized $62 million, but only one-third of that amount has been budgeted.

It is also significant that of the $490 million appropriated since 1950 for civil defense, $219,550,000, or less than one-half, has been spent for stockpiling emergency medical supplies, blood plasma, engineering equipment, and to procure a number of emergency hospitals which have frequently been used during national disasters. About $85 million has been used to purchase civilian defense equipment on a matching basis with States and cities.

The legislation enacted last year, Public Law 606 of the 85th Congress, provides that the Federal Government shall share the costs of civilian defense with States and cities. This legislation has long been urged on Congress by the Governor's conference, by the American Municipal Association, of which Mayor Celebrezze, of Cleveland, is president, and by the U.S. Conference of Mayors. Indeed, mayors and local officials in my colleague's home State of Ohio and of my own State of New York are members of those organizations.

Also, it is important to note that the State and cities expenditures for civil defense purposes have averaged only $9 million a year. Congress enacted the legislation so the Federal Government would be authorized to do more.

I should like to point out one further fact in connection with the budget figure, and that is the OCDM now has a rather important increase in responsibilities over what it had before as strictly a civilian defense agency. For example, it is observed that the Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization, under a budget item of $2,285,000 has a new duty under the Trade Agreements Act. It now has duties with respect to stockpiling of strategic materials. It now has duties in connection with national mobilization, including the preparation of business and labor for national emergency, the establishment of petroleum reserves, and the securing of some $6 billion worth of machine tools which we have stockpiled against a national emergency.

Also included in the $86,970,000 budget figure is an item of $11 million for a public education program of the effect of radioactive fallout, including training courses in 15,000 high schools, and for research and demonstration of shelters.

Funds are also required for opening a new regional office in the Pacific Northwest, to serve the four States there and the State of Alaska. Such an office has long been requested by Senators from that area.

Funds will also be required to finance the civil and defense mobilization functions of other Federal agencies.

In fact, deducting the above-mentioned figures necessary for new projects, the actual operating cost of the OCDM will be less than it was the previous year.

Finally, $13 million is budgeted so that the Federal Government may contribute to the States and local governments 50 percent of the cost of civil defense equipment, a program which has been in operation for some years.

Mr. President, I interject this thought: I mentioned the very horrible danger of casualties from an all-out attack on the continental United States and the certainty of the new strategic concept which now animates planning both on the part of the Soviet Union and on the part of the United States should the holocaust of another world war strike us. In other words, both sides now think in terms of an attack on the very heart of the other side, in its own territory.

Mr. President, that brings to mind the point that no matter what one might say about these casualties and their dread character, or about the inability to protect against them with shelters or other means known to us today, one thing is certain: That if one gets away from the center of attack one does have some degree of opportunity to save his life. This is found to be true by all the experts on the subject. In other words, even if one gets away a mile or two there is a very material diminution in the casualty danger.

So, Mr. President, if the whole organization did nothing else but plan for and think through the problem of evacuation, it seems to me that $86 million would be pretty cheap, considering what is involved in terms of life and considering what we are putting up in terms of the positive side of our national defense, for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force—some $41 billion.

Mr. President, that is the very thing which my dear friend and colleague took occasion to criticize. He said:

> A 2-year study was undertaken—and, of course, all the persons who undertook that study here in Washington were being paid high salaries—and now the civil defense agency is about to publish and distribute 850,000 copies of a guidebook to be distributed, at Government expense, to all residing within a 20-mile radius of the Washington Monument. The purpose is to indicate an evacuation zone and escape route to cities in Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia, where help is supposed to be available to persons forced to evacuate Washington, D.C.

Mr. President, I respectfully submit, if that is the only thing we can do—and perhaps it is—it is still a tremendously useful thing which takes enormously involved planning, which requires people to do the planning, and which requires people to do the organizing. It is tremendously useful to the posture of the country.

Mr. President, we tried this out in New York City. We actually stopped the life and the movement of the city, and had an experimental evacuation with respect to the city. We learned that with good organization we could attain an amazing amount of evacuation in the event of attack.

The head of the civil defense organization in New York City is Lieutenant General Hubner. Lieutenant General Hubner is a man of great experience. He took over the command of forces in Europe when they were relinquished by General Clay. General Hubner has been the director of civil defense under three Governors of New York, regardless of party. General Hubner, it seems to me, is a pretty good example of what can and might be done in the civil defense program.

In New York we have a very strong civil defense organization. It is probably the strongest organization in any State in the United States. We have a very comprehensive act, giving our Governor in particular very great powers in the event of an emergency caused by an attack in the State of New York. We have spent in New York more than any other State has spent, on our civil defense problems.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that if the whole effort were directed only toward the technique, the possibilities of and the organization for evacuation, considering the evidence we have that evacuation itself brings about tremendous diminution in possible casualties, then the money would be very well spent.

Mr. President, I think that is something of an answer to the statement of my colleague from Ohio, which I read from the RECORD:

> Our constituents are entitled to know if their tax money is being spent wisely in the field of civil defense.

Mr. President, it seems to me that our constituents would have quite a large claim against us, and a very righteous and just one, if we were not trying to do something about the civilian defense picture. It seems to me that $86 million for the whole United States is perhaps too little—I hope not too late, but perhaps too little, and certainly not too much.

I join my colleague from Ohio in the desire to see every dollar well and wisely spent, but I do not begrudge one penny of it to this very critical effort to protect our people in yet another area.

Mr. President, again I draw on my foreign policy experience to say that the corollary of the proposition that both sides now have in mind only the capability for attack upon the heartland of the other is the proposition that the posture of the capability for some kind of defense within that heartland also represents a factor to be considered before one attacks. I think it is now an open secret that in the territory of the Soviet Union there are very marked civil defense preparations which are very expensive ones and far more elaborate than anything we have undertaken or considered undertaking even under the budget of which my colleague complains in terms of its amount.

In addition to the other factors, of course, with respect to civil defense, it is a fact that this is an organized body of men and women, with material and establishments, which is tremendously useful to the country in any emergency. Perhaps it was a long time overdue that we should have that and should not be required to depend exclusively either upon the military forces, which ought not necessarily be diverted for that purpose, or upon voluntary organizations such as the Red Cross.

It is to be remembered that in the tragic floods in the State represented in part by my colleague from Ohio, as is true with respect to flood and storm damage in my own State of New York in 1956 and 1957, supplies and men, organized for the purpose, have been tremendously useful in saving towns, cities, and lives.

Thousands of sandbags from civil defense surpluses are being used to save towns and cities of Ohio from floods. Hundreds of cots and thousands of civil defense blankets are being used. Dozens of "ducks" from civil defense stocks are in service for rescue and evacuation. Generators are used to light rescue operations and as a temporary source of power for towns which are flooded out in Ohio. Water purifiers are used to clean the water which has been contaminated by the floods. Scores of water pumpers are being used to pump out basements and to lower the flood water level in the disaster areas. And surplus pipe is being used in the pumping operations.

The OCDM reports that 77 emergency 200-bed hospitals have been put on call; and medical supplies from Columbus, Marion, and Zanesville are available and have been used in the past. The effective use of this equipment during the hurricanes, floods, and other disasters has been repeatedly demonstrated.

In my own State, for example, in 1956 and 1957, we suffered from hurricanes Connie and Diane. At the time of the Cameron disaster in Louisiana we had another demonstration of how civil defense organization and material can be very useful, even in times when it is not needed for its essential purpose.

Recently in Ohio hundreds of civil defense workers, trained in part with Federal funds, have been used for evacuation and rescue work throughout the State. To date, 16,821 persons throughout the country have been trained for work at the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization's training school. These workers are available for rescue work, evacuation, traffic control, and first aid.

We know that throughout the years the Appropriations Committees in both bodies of Congress, consisting of intelligent, conscientious public servants, have given studious consideration to the requests of OCDM, and, after careful search into the need for expenditures, have recommended the appropriation of sums which have been asked for.

This Agency has a new and vigorous leader, Gov. Leo A. Hoegh, formerly Governor of Iowa, who has recently, through the President, promulgated an effective national plan for civil defense and defense mobilization so necessary for our survival in this nuclear and jet age.

I have tried to outline in a little detail—but I hope not too much detail—something which I think is fundamental in our national life with respect to civil defense. I used the analogy of the U.S. Information Agency. I do not know why it is that, in our current move, which should be one of awareness and sophistication, appropriations of $41 billion for military hardware, armed service pay, and research and development, are voted with very little question. There may be 2 or 3 or 4 days of debate in the Senate on such an authorization or appropriation, as the case may be, or both; and the money is voted and spent. In round figures, such appropriations represent more than 50 percent of our budget. Yet when it comes to the United States Information Agency, which is fighting the propaganda war, or the Civil Defense Agency, which is designed to put us in some domestic posture of at least a modicum of confidence by reason of having an organized body of men and women who can give us a slight amount of help if the dreadful holocaust should strike; or when it comes to an appropiration of $700 million or $800 million for economic aid to the peoples of the free world whose hearts and minds it is absolutely essential for us to win for the cause of freedom if the free world is to survive—with respect to expenditures for such purposes, we are always crushed by the burden of taxation imposed on the people of the United States.

We should all grow up. I am not speaking only to the distinguished Senator who made the speech referred to. I believe the program is a good thing. Let us test it out. Let us find out what it is all about. Let us scrutinize the program. I am convinced that if we dig into the civil defense problem thoroughly, the appropriation will not be less, but greater. There is a grave deficiency in our law, which concerns 4 million devoted people who, if they are injured or killed in line of duty, receive very little consideration from the U.S. Government, notwithstanding the fact that they are serving a very essential function of the U.S. Government. So the program may cost us more rather than less if we look into it carefully.

I have devoted myself to this subject this afternoon in the spirit of discussing both sides of the question, and in the expectation that the country can do nothing but profit from the debate and investigation with respect to the subject which my friend and colleague took the initiative in bringing up.

I think we must understand better that we are not only engaged in a total struggle for freedom, but also in a total defense with respect to freedom. Whether it be civil defense, the U.S. Information Agency, economic aid, or any one of a dozen other programs, they are absolutely essential. In many respects appropriations for those purposes are just as essential as appropriations for troops and armament.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the very fine presentation by the distinguished senior Senator from New York. I am mindful of the comments of the very able junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG]. As I understood his statement in the RECORD yesterday, what the able Senator from Ohio was trying to do was to eliminate unnecessary waste and unnecessary spending.

I wish to go on record now as endorsing both the concept of the Senator from Ohio and of the Senator from New York. I commend the Senator from New York for expressing his views on this subject, which he has not only the right, but the duty, to do. The great civil defense program being undertaken in New York City is far larger than any such program in my State of Colorado; and, I suspect, larger than any such program in Ohio.

Notwithstanding our desire to cut the budget, notwithstanding our desire to eliminate unnecessary spending wherever we can, it seems to me that whatever the increase is, if it is a reasonable increase, it will not cost the people of the Nation more than a fraction of a cent apiece to have some sort of civil defense program. We cannot justify, on any moral or ethical basis, the failure to have some sort of program.

Senators ask, "Why do we not do more for civil defense?" We are spending so much on the military, and our budget is now so great and our revenues are so limited in relation to what we are spending, that we cannot afford to enter into as extensive a civil defense program as we should.

As the able Senator from New York has pointed out, some of us were in World War I, and others were in World War II. Does any sensible person believe today that if world war III should come—and God save us if it should come—this Nation could escape atomic warfare? I believe no sensible person would make such a contention.

Now, let us consider the next problem. If we do get into atomic warfare, Americans will die by the hundreds of thousands—yes, by the millions. Is it too much to ask that we have a modest civil defense program to better protect our people and reduce potential casualties? The truth is that the present program is too small. The question is, How much can we afford?

Only a few months ago I happened to be on the island of Oahu. There on a mountain I saw an old artillery fortification. The cannons had been taken down. Warfare has changed since the days those cannons were used. Within that great mountain were tunnels. What was stored in those tunnels? They were the headquarters of the civil defense organization. There were great quantities of blood plasma, taken there by the Honolulu Police Department. There are many civilians devoting their time to this work.

The Senator from Ohio has a good point when he asks whether some of the top positions in civil defense are being used to provide jobs for defeated political candidates. I think that is a fair inquiry.

Are those workers skilled in the job of civil defense? Or are we giving the leadership of a vital program, on which the American people are spending millions of dollars, to defeated and discarded politicians?

I am not speaking of the present. I am looking back into the past. I am thinking not only of Republicans, but Democrats as well.

When we are spending the amount of money involved in this program, we are entitled to have workers who are skilled in the field of civil defense. We are entitled to have learned and able men make studies. As the able senior Senator from New York has pointed out, this program can be extremely critical. We shall know more about the situation in the next 2 or 3 months. With the Berlin crisis facing us, we are passing through one of the most critical phases of American political life.

We must avoid being saddled with hacks in the vital jobs, about which the junior Senator from Ohio has spoken. We are spending an insignificant amount of money on civil defense. It costs the taxpayers of the country less than 10 cents out of every hundred tax dollars for the present civil defense program. Therefore I see the merit of the argument on each side—the argument made by the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio and the argument made, in the best democratic tradition, by my good friend, the senior Senator from New York. The question of the value of the civil defense program has been raised, and in solving the problem we must be careful not to be penny wise and pound foolish.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague from Colorado. I should like to say to him that he interprets correctly the mood, if not the words, of the Senator from Ohio. It would be a privilege for me to join in the effort that must be made in doing what we believe ought to be done, within the limits of our competence, and to see to it that we are getting a dollar's worth for every dollar we spend. It is certainly necessary to eliminate hacks who have come into high places in the civil defense program.

I might point out in this connection that we Senators have a way of laying on with a broad sword, and I also know of the necessity for getting at the specific and selecting what we ought to do and what we ought not to do.

What concerns me, for example, was my colleague's statement, which I read:

> My view is that here is a place where we may save taxpayers millions of dollars and in no manner place this Nation in jeopardy, were we to curtail or eliminate civil defense expenditures and do away with unnecessary and unproductive high-salaried civil defense officials.

Well, Mr. President, I am not for eliminating and for curtailing. I am in favor of refining and making precise and effective and efficient. I am against high salaries. For example, if I had a corporation president of a corporation in which I had stock, and he was earning my corporation $10 million a year, I would gladly pay him $350,000 a year in salary. If, on the other hand, the president were ruining the corporation, I would not pay him 10 cents. That goes for civil defense directors, Senators, members of the Cabinet, and individuals. Everyone is entitled to be paid what he is worth.

Therefore I agree with the Senator from Ohio that we should curtail unnecessary and unproductive high salaries in civil defense.

The high salaries paid in Government, in this modern day, are getting to be something of a joke to the American people. Some people think $20,000 or $25,000 is a high salary.

I do not believe that the Senator from Ohio or I would object to paying $20,000 or $25,000 in salary to a high class man who would do an effective job and who would do the work efficiently. I am sure he would agree with me that we do not want stooges or hacks or discredited people in high-salaried jobs. We do not want people in those jobs who are not good for anything else.

So I close, Mr. President, with the hope that we may, taking our lessons from a mutual analysis of the situation, and finding our respective weak points, from our discussion of the subject, in which I have been enlightened and aided by my good friend from Colorado, at the same time appreciating the initiative of my friend from Ohio—although I do not agree with his major premises—go forward in the situation in order to see what we are really doing, what we really ought to do, and what it ought to cost, and being in favor of that cost, considering the absolutely indispensable element of the national security, which it represents.

Mr. CARROLL. I should like to say a few more words while the Senator from New York is still on the floor. I wish the RECORD to be clear that I have no desire to reflect on the present occupant of the high office at the head of civil defense. I do not know the gentleman. I know nothing about his background. Therefore it would be presumptuous to include him in a general category of questionable appointments. I do wish to say this, however. What I have to say applies to more than civil defense. It explains also why I am in support of the stand taken by the Senator from Ohio.

Recently I read in the public press that a distinguished Coloradan, James Smith, who had been brought to Washington to head ICA, and who, I am ready to believe, did a magnificent job in that position, was to be elevated to be Secretary of the Navy.

Several responsible press sources have reported that he did not receive the approval of the chairman of the Republican National Committee because he had not given enough attention to the personnel recommendations for Republican jobseekers which had been made by the chairman. I cite for example an article appearing in the New York Times on February 7 by E. W. Kenworthy entitled "Mr. Smith Leaves Washington After Alcorn Revises Scenario." I ask unanimous consent that the article be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 7, 1959]

MR. SMITH LEAVES WASHINGTON AFTER ALCORN REVISES SCENARIO

(By E. W. Kenworthy)

WASHINGTON, February 6.—The Republican National Committee was grinding out a sequel today to "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," and party managers hoped it would do well at the party's box office.

Mr. Smith—in this case Mr. James H. Smith, Jr.—quietly left Washington for his home in Aspen, Colo., last Saturday. This was a few hours after he had turned in his resignation as Director of the International Cooperation Administration.

Mr. Smith went home, it was understood, a disappointed man unlike the Mr. Smith of the film success of the 1930's, who managed to survive the political pitfalls of Washington.

The present Mr. Smith had not received the appointment to succeed his friend, Thomas S. Gates, Jr., as Secretary of the Navy as he had confidently expected and as the administration had confidently planned.

Mr. Smith had taken the ICA job in the summer of 1957 on the understanding that he would leave it in January 1959. He was highly regarded in the administration for his performance in the post, and for his prior service as Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The barrier was placed in Mr. Smith's path, administration and party officials agreed today, by Meade Alcorn, Republican national chairman. Mr. Alcorn was also said to be blocking the appointment of a Connecticut Democrat as Mr. Smith's successor.

Republican politicans made no secret of the fact that Mr. Alcorn had put a big black mark against Mr. Smith more than a year ago, shortly after Mr. Smith became head of the ICA, the foreign aid agency.

At that time, it was said, Mr. Smith and Mr. Alcorn had a frank talk during which time Mr. Smith told Mr. Alcorn that he was not going to give jobs to Republicans simply because they were Republicans.

Since then, several little black marks have been set against Mr. Smith's name in the book kept at party headquarters at 1625 I Street.

ACCEPTED AND REJECTED

One of these involved a person working at party headquarters—a trained professional worker, it was said—who applied for a job at ICA and was accepted. When Mr. Smith learned that this person had been working at Republican headquarters, it was related, he refused to approve the appointment.

One party official summed up today Mr. Alcorn's attitude toward Mr. Smith:

Jimmie Smith was unnecessarily neutral.

A further development in Mr. Smith's story, it was reported, concerned Henry R. Labouisse, a longtime Government official. C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs has been suggesting Mr. Labouisse as the new Director of ICA.

SERVED U.N. IN NEAR EAST

Mr. Labouisse retired last June as director of the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees. Prior to his 4 years in the Near East, he had held several State Department posts connected with foreign aid.

Because of this professional experience Mr. Dillon wanted Mr. Labouisse. This choice had been cleared all the way up to the White House, officials said today.

However, Mr. Labouisse comes from Connecticut—the home State of Mr. Alcorn, and he registered there as a Democrat in 1941. An associate explained today that this was more than Mr. Alcorn could be expected to endure without outcry.

Mr. Alcorn's outcries, it was said, have induced a sympathetic response from Senator PRESCOTT BUSH, Republican, of Connecticut.

Senator BUSH has said that if the administration is "looking for a professional" to head International Cooperation Administration it can find him in Leonard J. Saccio, now the agency's Deputy Director.

Mr. Saccio comes from Connecticut. He is a Republican.

Associates of Mr. Smith gave this account of how he came to Washington and left it.

When he took the ICA job, it was said, he was led to believe, these officials said, that in due time he would succeed Robert Cutler as Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs.

However, Mr. Cutler resigned for health reasons last June, too soon for Mr. Smith to take his post. As a consequence Gordon Gray, head of the Office of Defense Mobilization, was appointed to succeed Mr. Cutler.

Some time ago Secretary Gates, who was planning to resign, approached his Under Secretary, William F. Franke, and asked if it were true, as he had been informed, that Mrs. Franke did not wish a promotion to Secretary for health reasons. Mr. Franke, according to officials, said this was so.

Thereupon, it was said, Mr. Gates undertook to get the appointment for his friend, Mr. Smith.

According to associates of Mr. Smith, Mr. Gates told Mr. Smith that everything was set. But Mr. Gates also told others the same thing, and the appointment got in the papers before the White House had given the final word.

Thereupon, it was said, Mr. Alcorn got busy. Mr. Franke was persuaded to change his mind.

Mr. Smith left Washington last Saturday. On Monday, Mr. Gates' resignation was announced, effective next June. His successor will be Mr. Franke.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, this is one of the reasons I say we ought to begin taking an interest in these important appointments. It is a congressional responsibility as much as it is an executive responsibility, and we must take an interest in these matters.

Last year an important investigation was conducted by the House of Representatives Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight. One of the principal findings of that committee during its investigation was that so far as the independent regulatory agencies and commissions were concerned, the ability, efficiency, experience, character, and integrity of those who are to be appointed to responsible positions must be thoroughly examined and given greatest weight before an appointment is made.

It is the responsibility of the executive branch of the Government and also the responsibility of Congress to investigate and to hear and to discuss the qualifications of the men who are to exert an enormous influence in the operation of our Government.

Therefore, I commend the Senator from Ohio for taking a stand against unnecessary expense, and I urge upon him the issue raised by the distinguished senior Senator from New York.

In an organization of the kind we are discussing there is bound to be some waste at some time or other. But I believe it would be a great disservice to the people of this Nation not to increase the appropriations for civil defense. At the present time they are very meager indeed. They are actually so meager that the organization is short handed, and is prevented from doing the kind of job it ought to do. They are able to do only the minimum amount of work that must be done. We have seen what happens when the right job is not done, because we have not given them enough money to do the kind of job that ought to be done. Unfortunately it would cost billions of dollars to do the job properly. However, some day—and we hope that day will never come—we may have to spend that kind of money. At present we are giving the Civil Defense Agency a trifling amount of money.

We are spending less than a hundred million dollars on the program. As I have said, it costs the American taxpayers less than 10 cents out of every hundred tax dollars to support the civil defense program. On February 6 the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] put into the RECORD a table showing how every $100 of taxpayer's money is spent. Out of each $100 paid by a taxpayer, $59.50 is spent for defense; $10.50 of each $100 goes to pay the interest on the public debt. It is deplorable that with $59.50 out of every $100 of taxpayers' money spent on defense, we are allocating no more than 10 cents out of each $100 for civil defense.

We must at least have a skeleton civil defense organization, although for security reasons and for the ultimate best protection of the people we should have far more than a mere skeleton organization. The organization should have the money it needs. By the same token, however, we should prevent the type of people about whom the Senator from Ohio directed his very pertinent remarks, from being given high paid, responsible, political appointments.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting a nomination was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Lester L. Cecil, of Ohio, to be U.S. circuit judge for the sixth circuit, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SELECTION OF LEADVILLE, COLO., AS ALL AMERICA CITY

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I am most happy to call to the attention of the Senate the selection of Leadville, Colo., by a notable board of judges as a winner in the All America City contest sponsored annually by Look magazine.

Naturally, I am most happy at the selection of Leadville for this high award. I know of no city which is more deserving, for it has faced many discouragements, took them in stride, and came up smiling and eager to make Leadville a better place to live.

Nestled in the clouds, 2 miles above sea level, it is a small city which has figured prominently in the history of Colorado. Its mines have poured forth millions of dollars. Great fortunes were made there, and the hardy citizens used much of this money to build a better Colorado. The first store of the nationwide May Co. chain of department stores was in Leadville. There Charles Boettcher, father of the beet-sugar industry in the West, got his start. Charles S. Thomas, a distinguished former U.S. Senator, first practiced law in Leadville. I could go on and on in telling of the exploits of those who made their start in the once booming mining camp—one of the lustiest and most riproaring in all the West.

Other mining camps folded up and became ghost cities. But not Leadville. It carried on because there dwelt within its borders people of spirit and people of imagination. They did not despair in the face of adversity, but instead pitched in and worked to build and progress. The odds were not too great, because they retained the frontier spirit. They had spirit and optimism.

I am proud of Leadville for its fighting spirit. I have many happy memories of that 2-mile-high city and its fine people. The genuine and sheer bravery of its hardy citizens inspires the people of the entire State.

In citing Leadville for the award, coveted by many hundreds of cities, Look magazine said:

> In the lusty, roaring 1880's, this mining town, perched 2 miles high in the Rockies, was jammed with fortune hunters. Leadville was called the Magic City, because here some of the Nation's great fortunes in gold, silver, and other minerals were made and sometimes lost. Until recently, it was still more of a mining camp than an organized municipality. By 1952, its citizens (latest count 4,500) realized it was time to modernize their town whose economy hinges on the world's largest molybdenum mine in nearby Climax. The first start was a $699,000 bond issue for schools. The same year, Leadville got its first sewers and sanitation plant with a $200,000 bond issue. The next year, a big volunteer effort, plus a limited budget, brought the community a recreation program, three ball parks, an all-purpose park and playground and an enclosed swimming pool. With Federal funds matched by wide citizen support, the community completed a modern million-dollar hospital after a 4-year campaign. And in 1957, Leadville spent over $200,000 for its first street paving project. The city has witnessed more improvements in the last 7 years than in the last 70.

The citation from Look magazine tells only a part of the story of the courageous and public spirited men and women of Leadville who have made that fine city a better and more pleasant place in which to live. Nature was kind to Leadville. Its majestic scenery is unequaled. Its towering mountain peaks lend a grandeur that is breathtaking. It is near the headwaters of the Arkansas River, and the mountain snows furnish the water for a vast area.

Probably the story of H. A. W. Tabor and Baby Doe Tabor is the one heard most frequently about Leadville. The tragic story of the Tabors has been retold many times. But there are many, many historic facts of more importance than the Tabor story.

Leadville is not living on its past. It is interested in the present and the future. That interest resulted in the selection of Leadville as one of 10 all-America cities. I know my colleagues will join with me in appreciation of the public spirited citizens who have made the honor possible.

THE BUDGET AND EXECUTIVE BRANCH REQUESTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have no intention of reopening yesterday's debate. The record will speak for itself; and I believe the record is clear.

However, I believe that one aspect of the debate over the budget has not yet been fully covered: It is the true nature of the problem Congress faces, a problem regarding which the Congress needs help, not opposition, from the executive branch.

Mr. President, somehow there has been presented a picture of one branch of the Government fiercely determined to hold the line on spending, and another branch determined to spend and spend and spend. I believe that is a distorted picture.

What has really happened is that the President, through the Budget Bureau, has sent to Congress a number of recommendations. Some of those recommendations—and I speak in measured words—call for increased spending; some call for decreased spending; and some call for spending about the same amounts.

The President has also stated that he will "hold the line" against certain unspecified increases in amounts.

Among the increases the executive branch has asked for is $4,555 million of supplemental authority for the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank. For some reason, the President has requested that Congress place that item in this year's budget. I have been assured by the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the distinguished junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] that full and thorough hearings will be held on this proposal. The committee will seek to determine, among other things, the urgency for action in this fiscal year, rather than in the next fiscal year, which begins July 1.

In the 1960 budget the President also has his requests for increases in appropriations, some of which he wants recorded for the current fiscal year: for Mutual Security, an increase of 26 percent; for the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, an increase of 80 percent over the amount of last year—as so thoroughly and eloquently pointed out on yesterday by the distinguished junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], who now occupies the chair; for the U.S. Information Agency, an increase of 6 percent over the amount of last year; for the Fish and Wildlife Service, an increase of 12 percent over the amount of last year; for State Department salaries and expenses, an increase of 10 percent over the amount of last year; for the Bureau of the Budget itself, an increase of 2 percent over the amount of last year—contrasted with a 2 percent cut which has been ordered this year for employees in all Government agencies except the Bureau of the Budget. Although the order was to cut the number of employees in all other agencies, apparently that rule has not been applied to the Bureau of the Budget itself.

Presumably to offset those increases, word has gone down the line that the President will hold the line against unspecified increases by a coequal branch of the Government—the Congress—in the case of building homes for people, in the case of building airports for the jet age, in the case of urban redevelopment for the great metropolitan areas of the Nation, and in the case of many other proposals.

Mr. President, I have never believed in the idea of verdict before trial. I shall not pass judgment upon the President's requests for increased spending authority until I have heard all the facts and until he has had a chance to justify the increased spending he has requested authority to make.

I know of only one way the Congress has to obtain the facts: It is to hold hearings, by means of the appropriate committees—committees which can call expert witnesses, and can have the cold figures spread on the record, where they can be studied by all who will listen and learn.

On issues such as these, I would remind my colleagues that Congress must act as a jury. Congress has a responsibility which cannot be abdicated to the Executive or to anyone else. Experience has generally shown that Congress cuts some requests, leaves some as they are, and increases some.

Mr. President, when I conclude this term, I shall have spent almost 30 years in the legislative branch of the Government. I say on my responsibility as a member of that branch of the Government—so that all who will read or hear may be informed—that few Congresses have not reduced the Executive's requests overall.

Mr. President, it is my belief that this will be a prudent and, I trust, a cooperative Congress; and it can be helped much more by Executive cooperation than by efforts to secure a verdict before the evidence has been given and before it has been weighed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD certain figures which I now send to the desk. The figures for the increases in amounts which I should like to insert in the RECORD are those I stated a moment ago in the case of the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund; also the $38,685,000 increase for the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, for 1960; the $864 million for foreign aid, again for the fiscal year 1960; an increase in the neighborhood of more than $7 million for the United States Information Agency, also for the fiscal year 1960.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(a) $4,555,000,000 in the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund (for this fiscal year).

(b) $38,685,000 for civil defense (for fiscal 1960).

(c) $864,000,000 for foreign aid (again fiscal 1960).

(d) $7,000,000 for the USIA (fiscal 1960).

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I did not hear all of the observations made by the majority leader commenting on increases in the President's budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be glad to supply the Senator with a copy.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I did come into the Chamber in time to hear him allude to one increase. I like always to make sure the whole record is made. In the case of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, it was increased from $45 million-plus to $86 million-plus. All one has to do is break the figures down and see how the increase developed. Obviously the President does not do it. It has to be done by legislation. So it is, in my judgment, the responsibility of Congress.

I remember the very spirited debate we had last year on civil defense. When we got through we in this Congress added $21 million to the appropriation for civil defense for the purpose of cooperating and sharing with the States. That was not the President's responsibility. That was ours. Congress did it. It was simply carrying out a mandate of Congress.

When one examines the budget and the different increases, he will find many of them are nothing more than pay increases which have been mandated by the legislative branch.

I shall, in due course, examine the statement, and make comments on all the items referred to and exactly how those increases eventuated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have not pointed out at any time that these increases should be made or should not be made. I merely pointed out that the Congress has yet to even hear testimony on why they are made.

I do not know who is kidding who when the assertion is made that pay increases required a doubled appropriation so far as civil defense is concerned. I am not aware anybody's pay has been doubled by any act of Congress. So it is another attempt to confuse the people.

I think what the people of the country had better do is sit back in their chairs and wait until the testimony is in, wait until the witnesses are heard, wait until the explanations are given, and then form their judgments based upon the record, instead of propaganda.

STATEMENT BY FORMER SENATOR KNOWLAND BEFORE YOUNG MEN'S REPUBLICAN CLUB OF KING COUNTY, WASH.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD a speech delivered this last week by the Honorable William F. Knowland, a former leader in this body, and one of the Nation's great citizens.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, ANNUAL BANQUET, YOUNG MEN'S REPUBLICAN CLUB OF KING COUNTY, THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 12, 1959, OLYMPIC HOTEL, SEATTLE, WASH.

Fellow Americans, this is no time for defeatism. It is the time for reflection, for constructive criticism of past action or inaction, for reorganization, and for a forward movement along the whole front.

It was Abraham Lincoln in 1858, the year of his defeat for the Senate and 2 years before his election to the Presidency, who said: "If we could first know where we are and whither we are tending, we could then better judge what to do and how to do it."

For us as Americans and for us as Republicans has come simultaneously the imperative need to stop, look, and listen in order to determine, if possible, "where we are and whither we are tending."

The Whig Party failed to do this in the 1850's and passed out of existence.

The Nation in the 1840's and 1850's failed to solve the slavery question and the decisions were finally made in the fiery crucible of a great civil war.

There is much talk these days about the need for precinct organization. This is, of course, vitally important. But to make this No. 1 on the list is to put the cart before the horse.

It seems to me that as Republicans we must first determine for what we stand rather than for whom we stand.

Neither our domestic problems nor our international dangers can be determined safely by officials selected on the basis of the best Pepsodent smile nor on the basis that regardless of the principles or policies for which he stands that the incumbent of one's own party has permanent tenure in the office he holds.

Such an approach in these critical times can lead to decay in our party and disaster to our Nation.

It is far less fatal for a party to lose an election than to become all things to all men in order to win it.

Would it not be well for Republicans (and Democrats for that matter) to hold annual conventions in each of our States in order to get a real grassroots understanding as to what the rank and file think and the things for which they want their party to stand?

I do not believe this can or should be left to the officeholders alone. The party is far bigger than any gathering of incumbents on the local, county, State, or National level.

At times the officeholder may think his own reelection is more important than giving the people clear-cut decisions on major policy matters. To him it may be, but to the party and the Nation vacillation and postponing the decision may lead to a more violent outburst later on, as was the case 100 years ago.

Some basic decisions need to be thought out and fought out ahead of the national nominating conventions.

No single person or small group has the answer to all our problems as a nation or a party. But I do have a confidence that out of the ranks of the people will come the principles and the leadership to again save our Nation at one of the great turning points of history.

Nations, parties, and individuals have both victories and defeats. They can and should learn from both.

I have no regrets for having raised the issues or having made the fight in California last year. It helped, I believe, to alert the people of our State and of the Nation to some of the problems ahead of us.

Despite misrepresentation of my position and the propaganda efforts of the labor bosses, the facts of the matter are that I believe in strong and effective unions.

I said last year and I repeat now:

"Unions should be responsible to their own membership and to the American public. With power must always go responsibility. Collective bargaining must not become collective bludgeoning."

Since last November, James Hoffa has announced his intention to have every policeman wear a Teamster membership button.

I do not believe this would be conducive to impartial law enforcement, for the public good nor indeed, in the best interests of labor unionism as a whole.

How can we best preserve our priceless heritage? That is our challenge as a nation, as a party, and as individuals.

You here will play a part in the great decisions that will win or lose this historic battle.

What are my beliefs in this regard?

I give them to you, as the reflections of one who for 30 years has been active in the ranks of the Republican Party and for the past 13 years as a Member of the U.S. Senate during the last 6 years of which I served as both majority and minority leader:

1. We must preserve the Federal constitutional system and actively oppose the tendency to break down State lines.

2. We must preserve American competitive enterprise, from the monopolistic onslaughts of both big business and big labor.

3. We must stand for responsible and solvent government on the local, State and National level.

4. We must stand for the protection of the individual citizen against the enroachments of the criminal underworld, labor goonsters or business racketeers and this is and should remain primarily the responsibility of local and State authorities.

5. We must stand for the protection of our Nation, its constitutional Government and the free world, and for this we must primarily depend on the Federal Government and such reliable allies that care to be associated with us in this common effort. We must understand that you cannot purchase either individual or collective friendship.

6. We must preserve the incentives that will continue to encourage investors to take risks to start new businesses or enlarge existing ones so that more job opportunities will open up for our increasing population. Too high a tax structure, invasion of the Government into price fixing, and labor's enroachment upon responsibilities belonging to management can weaken if not destroy these incentives.

7. Government should not become confiscatory in its tax levying. Except in case of war, Federal income taxes should not exceed 331⅓ percent of personal income nor more than 40 percent of corporate income. Out of the earnings of corporations and the savings of individuals must come the capital investment to keep American industry ahead of that of the totalitarian Socialist-Communist state.

8. Every American citizen of voting age is entitled to vote based on standards of qualification applicable without regard to race, color, or sex. The citizens of all the States have an interest in seeing that the citizens of none of the States are denied such rights.

9. Federal funds will ultimately lead to Federal controls. Federal encroachment in the field of education should be resisted.

10. In guarding the rights of one group we must not abuse the rights of other groups. The right to determine ones religious, fraternal, and social associations is fundamental and should not be surrendered upon any pretext of protecting minority rights.

Now these are not all inclusive by any means. But to me all are pretty fundamental and furnish a point around which large numbers of present-day Republicans, Democrats, and independents (North, South, East, and West) might join together with a common objective and a mutuality of interest.

Once we establish a large area of agreement on principles, we are then in a position to sign up large numbers of workers who can campaign with intelligence and enthusiasm for the candidates running on an understandable and agreed program.

Too often now the worker is unclear as to what his party stands for or who the party spokesman is. He may find his candidates for several offices opposed to each other on rather fundamental issues. This only adds to disunity and discouragement to the precinct worker and confusion among the voters.

Our Nation would not have been founded and the Union would not have been preserved if men and women had not been prepared to stand for certain fundamental principles, regardless of cost.

The preamble to our Constitution states:

"We, the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

The Constitution provides for its own amendment. By two-thirds vote of both Houses and ratification by three-fourths of the States.

Under this and related provisions our Constitution has been amended 22 times.

While it is a cumbersome process, neither the executive, legislative, or judicial branches should seek to or be allowed to short circuit this procedure in letter or in spirit.

Relating back now to the 10 principles of constitutionalism, let us examine specifics.

1. The growth of the Federal Government has been astronomical in character. The executive, legislative, and judicial branches have all at one time or another expanded Federal power and whittled away at the rights of the States. This trend needs to be reversed now before we pass the point of no return.

2. The Republican Party should forthrightly fight for the American private-enterprise system. New Dealers with governmental economic control of prices and wages are as dangerous to the future of free enterprise as are avowed Socialists who believe in Government ownership of the means of production. Whenever the people want New Dealism or socialism they will take the original and not a faded carbon copy.

3. No responsible official can ignore the fact that today our public debt is over $300 billion and that the interest on it amounts to over $8 billion a year.

This interest charge is greater than all income into the Treasury as late as 1941 and all expenditures as late as 1938.

The time has come for a drastic curtailment of foreign aid as a necessary step to putting our domestic finances in order. Foreign aid is used as a leverage for all kinds of local projects.

Sooner or later the overburdened taxpayer is going to ask if there is any more excuse for his paying for unconsumed agricultural products than for unsold refrigerators, unused paper or uncrated bicycles.

4. A government that cannot protect the legal and constitutional rights of its citizens is not worthy of being supported.

Our ancestors left the old world to get away from compulsory church membership. Compulsory union membership can negate the basic freedom of choice which Americans once held dear.

5. Freedom is indivisible. Lincoln said our Nation cannot be half slave and half free. Nor in our time can the world.

It has never made sense to me for American funds to be used in support of Communist Yugoslavia or Poland. Between them they have received over $2 billion.

This same sum of money very likely could have given us an earth satellite ahead of the Soviet sputnik.

How much more effective this would have been on friend, neutral and Communist alike than pouring our free enterprise dollars into these Communist sinkholes.

6. At Washington and throughout the Nation there are doctrinaire forces that believe in a regimented economy.

Under the slightest pretext they will move openly to reestablish OPA type controls over prices. Inevitably, this will lead to wage and commodity allocation controls and to the same chaotic conditions existing in 1946 and 1947, which brought the end to OPA.

There has been, in some quarters, a steady encroachment of labor upon the responsibilities of management that is becoming a detriment to small business and tends to cause small operators to sell out to larger competitors. This trend whether resulting from inequitable labor demands or a growing multiplicity of tax burdens is most harmful to our economic structure of which small business is an integral part.

7. Today the Federal Government is a major partner in most of the larger companies of the Nation, taking 52 percent in corporate income taxes.

The personal income taxes, Federal and State, are at the point where they put a wet blanket on the incentive which helped to build our Nation from a small colony of 3 million on the Atlantic coast to a great world power of 170 million, the most productive the world has ever known.

The drying up of savings for investment could slow down the continued modernization of American industry which is so essential if our productivity is to keep ahead of the Soviet Union.

8. Those who believe in States rights, as I do, will be on firmer ground if the constitutional right of citizens to vote without discrimination on grounds of race, or color is clearly manifest in all 49 States.

Then the power and dignity of the States to run their own affairs will rest on a firm foundation not easily assailable by those who would make the States, in effect, Federal provinces.

9. If there is any function in which the local people should keep control it is in the field of education. Where Federal funds go, ultimately Federal control will follow.

There is no such thing as free Federal money. It comes from the people residing in the 49 States. However, a dollar flowing from the States to Washington suffers substantial attrition before it comes back as a grant-in-aid.

10. The American Constitution was founded on the principle that the individual had certain rights that neither the Government nor even tyrannical temporary majorities could take from him.

For example, not even a unanimous vote of Congress, the approval of the President, or the action of the Supreme Court can take away his freedom of religion, press, or right to peaceably assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances (first amendment).

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude (15th amendment) or by reason of sex (19th amendment).

As we have already pointed out, approval of amendments takes a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress and three-fourths ratification by the States. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed (sec. 9, art. I).

There is one section of the Constitution that cannot be amended even by the amending process. Article V states "and that no State without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Minorities as well as majorities can at times be arbitrary as against the right of an individual to select his religion, his occupation, his fraternal colleagues or his individual associates.

The great asset of our way of life is that we uphold the dignity and independence of the individual citizen and our Constitution makes certain that the State is his servant and not his master. We believe in a divine being and communism is a Godless tyranny.

These are the great contrasts with totalitarian communism or fascism.

On these basic differences there is not and there cannot be any weakening of our faith or our beliefs.

We are admonished by II Corinthians: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?"

Almost 100 years have passed since Abraham Lincoln's election to the Presidency. His words come ringing down through the ages: "Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history * * *. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down in history to the latest generation. In giving freedom to the slave we assure freedom to the free. * * * We shall meanly lose or nobly save this last best hope of earth."

LOYALTY OATH AFFIDAVITS ARE UNFAIR, UNNECESSARY, AND USELESS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the disclaimer affidavit provision contained in the National Defense Education Act of 1958 constitutes an attempt to impose an obnoxious "test oath" on students and educators affected by this law.

The requirement of section 1001(f) (1) title X of the act has rightfully aroused the indignation of both academicians and laymen. It singles out teachers and their pupils as special objects of suspicion. It is wholly ineffective in achieving its avowed purpose. It is vague and invidious. It is contrary to our traditions of free thought.

Yesterday my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], presented a cogent argument for the repeal of this provision of existing law. He cited the brave reaction of one of the truly great colleges in the Nation—Reed College, in my native city of Portland, Oreg.—to this distasteful stipulation.

Mr. President, the distinction of Reed College is not one based on size of endowment or extent of enrollment, but upon intellectual spirit and achievement. These qualities make up for any lack of wealth and affluence.

Reed College recently demonstrated anew this independence of mind when it refused to accept funds under the National Defense Education Act if they were contingent upon a negative loyalty oath. This defiance by Reed College of a tyrannical and backward law has been encouraging to defenders of academic freedom everywhere in the Nation. It has added to the reputation of that institution in scholastic circles throughout the country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter and enclosures which I have received from Sara Lamb, secretary of the Reed College student council, which indicate the views of students, faculty, and administrators at Reed College regarding the disclaimer affidavit and loyalty oath.

There being no objection, the letter and enclosures were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REED COLLEGE STUDENT COUNCIL,
Portland, Oreg., February 10, 1959.

Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: We at Reed College feel that you might be interested in the reaction on the Reed campus to the National Defense Education Act. Our view is expressed in the enclosed resolutions passed by the Reed College faculty and the student council.

On February 2, President Richard Sullivan issued a statement for publication in the school newspaper, the Quest, noting the faculty resolution and stating in part:

"On Saturday, January 31, the board of trustees voted to delegate authority, regarding decisions to participate in programs under the National Defense Education Act of 1958, to the president of the college. It is my considered view that we should not participate at the present time while the act contains the requirement of the disclaimer affidavit."

In consideration of the above, the student council of Reed College urges that appropriate action be taken toward obtaining the repeal of title X, section 1001(f) (1) and (2) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958.

Sincerely yours,

SARA LAMB,
Student Council Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS CONCERNING THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT OF 1958, ADOPTED BY THE REED COLLEGE STUDENT COUNCIL ON FEBRUARY 2, 1959

Section 1001(f) of the National Defense Act of 1958, Public Law 864, passed by the 85th Congress, provides that each applicant for educational aid under the act must file an affidavit proclaiming that he "does not believe in, and is not a member of and does not support any organization that believes in, or teaches, the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods and has taken or subscribed to an oath or affirmation of the following form: I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America and will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States against all its enemies, foreign and domestic."

The provision of a loyalty oath requirement in this act, especially a negative oath such as the above, is contrary to American traditions of freedom and fair play.

The oath is vague. It requires the individual to make, upon pain of perjuring himself, sweeping statements about his beliefs and associations; and to disclaim affiliation with organizations which are not specified in the law.

The oath is insulting. Many groups in the United States receive Government economic aid without having to sign such oaths; the oath thus carries the implication that there is something about students which makes them particularly subject to disloyal influences, despite the fact that some of America's great patriots were closely associated with the academic community.

Principally, however, the oath is a restriction on freedom of belief and association. It gives Government aid to students, not solely on the grounds of their need and qualifications for such aid, but also on the basis of the organizations to which they belong and the ideas to which they adhere. The Government has thus attempted to replace the longstanding academic tradition of free exchange in the marketplace of ideas with a program in which the Government dictates what ideas shall be presented, and by whom. Such a restriction has no place in a governmental system based on freedom of speech and thought.

Therefore, we, the student council of Reed College, resolve our opposition to the loyalty oath provision of this act, and urge that it be amended to remove this provision.

Resolved—

Whereas the student council of Reed College has expressed its unanimous opposition to the political test oath provision of the National Defense Act of 1958; and

Whereas all such expressions of opposition may be instrumental in securing the act's amendment;

The student council calls upon President Richard H. Sullivan to refuse Reed College's participation in the act's educational aid program as a gesture of such protest, and to maintain such refusal as long as it appears likely to assist in effecting the removal of the repugnant test oath provision.

Resolved, That the faculty urges the president and the board of trustees to adopt the position that Reed College should not participate in a program which requires it either to administer to anyone a disclaimer affidavit such as that in the National Defense Education Act or to assume responsibility for seeing that anyone has executed such an oath or affidavit.

Resolved, That the faculty protests the requirement of a positive loyalty oath in the National Defense Education Act of 1958 and requests that appropriate action be taken toward the elimination of such a requirement from this act.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, within the past few days, the University of Oregon chapter of the American Association of University Professors unanimously called for the removal of the disclaimer affidavit and recommended that if efforts to obtain such action failed, the university administration refuse to accept funds made available through the act.

The professors pointed out that the Government has disbursed millions upon millions of dollars to various business, financial, and agricultural enterprises without requiring such a disclaimer affidavit.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter and a resolution which I have received from Ewart M. Baldwin, secretary of the University of Oregon chapter of the American Association of University Professors, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITY PROFESSORS,
UNIVERSITY OF OREGON CHAPTER,
Eugene, Oreg., February 13, 1959.

Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: The University of Oregon Chapter of the American Association of University Professors unanimously passed the following resolution concerning the disclaimer oath in the National Defense Education Act. A copy of our resolution is enclosed. We are particularly protesting the inclusion of the disclaimer oath and have no fault to find with the oath of allegiance similar to that taken by the President of the United States.

We urge that you use your influence to amend this act and until this is done, we are on record as favoring refusal of money under this act.

Respectfully,

EWART M. BALDWIN,
Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE GENERAL MEMBERSHIP OF THE UNIVERSITY OF OREGON CHAPTER A.A.U.P. BY THE TENURE, PROMOTION, AND SABBATICAL COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 11, 1959.

Whereas title X, section 1001(f)(1) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958 requires that a disclaimer affidavit be filed by any person receiving funds under the act; and

Whereas the Federal Government has disbursed millions upon millions of dollars to various business, financial, and agricultural enterprises without requiring such a disclaimer affidavit; and

Whereas the act seems thus to single out teachers and students as special objects of suspicion; and

Whereas the loyalty of students and teachers generally has been amply demonstrated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the University of Oregon chapter express approval of the actions taken by the national office of the American Association of University Professors (as reported in chapter letter No. VIII, of November 21, 1958) in protesting the discharge affidavit requirement; and be it further

Resolved, That the University of Oregon chapter of the American Association of University Professors request the Congress so to modify the existing legislation as to remove the offending section; and be it further

Resolved, That the University of Oregon chapter respectfully request the administration of the university to refuse the acceptance and administration of any funds under the National Defense Education Act of 1958 unless and until the provision requiring a disclaimer oath in the form stated in title X, section 1001(f)(1) of the National Defense Education Act of 1958 has been deleted.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, like the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon, I have received letters protesting certain provisions of section 1001(f) from Robert D. Clark, dean of the College of Liberal Arts at the University of Oregon; Donald Balmer, president of the Lewis and Clark College Chapter of the American Association of University Professors; Judah Bierman, chairman of the American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon; and others. These communications represent a telling indictment and I was pleased to see them inserted in the RECORD by my colleague for the information of the Senate, together with forthright and positive editorials from two of our State's leading daily papers, the Register-Guard of Eugene, Oreg., and the Medford Mail-Tribune, of Medford, Oreg.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my statement, similar expressions of view from other outstanding newspapers in my State, including the Oregonian of Portland, Oreg.; the Oregon Daily Statesman of Salem, Oreg.; and the East-Oregonian of Pendleton, Oreg.

I am proud of the fact that while my wife, Maurine, and I were members of the Oregon State Legislature, we were able to assist in the fight to prevent enactment of a test teacher's oath in our State. I believe that it is significant that Oregon has never demanded a loyalty oath of its educators.

Mr. President, an act designed to better train men's minds should not contain language reflecting on their ability to use them. I was happy to inform the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] of my support of his efforts to repeal this section of the National Defense Education Act through enactment of his bill, S. 819. I hope that the Senate will take swift action to correct this blot on a beneficial program.

There being no objection, the articles and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregonian, Dec. 17, 1958]

BAD PENNY BACK

The discredited loyalty oath has cropped up again, this time in an obscure section of the 1958 Federal Education Act. Administrators, teachers, and students who have applied for participation in the program have discovered that they are required to sign affidavits swearing that they do not belong to or support any organization advocating overthrow of the Government, the typical negative oath of the McCarthy era.

Thus, the measure for Federal aid to education, especially the sciences and languages, also serves to introduce students to an atmosphere of suspicion and conformity which most educators had hoped was in the past.

All Oregon public school and college teachers swear allegiance to the Constitutions and laws of the United States and Oregon. It is a positive expression of loyalty, such as that executed by other public officials, and can be made honorably.

Congress, whose Members also take a positive oath of allegiance but would not think or requiring of themselves a negative loyalty oath, should exhibit the same respect for the Nation's teachers and students by eliminating the cited provision. Few Congressmen were ever aware of its existence.

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., Feb. 11, 1959]

STUDENTS SUSPECT?

Reed College's rejection of Federal funds because acceptance is conditional on the recipients' subscribing to a negative loyalty oath reflects virtually the unanimous view of educators, although few institutions have taken the logical but painful course of paying for their convictions by refusing the proffered aid.

The provision for the oath is a hangover from the spirit of the McCarthy era. Few lawmakers knew of its existence, and now Senator JOHN KENNEDY, with bipartisan support, has moved for its repeal. Meanwhile, the harm has begun.

At the least, the provision constitutes a gratuitous insult to the prospective student beneficiaries of the modest loans provided under the National Defense Act. Each would be required to swear that he "does not believe in, and is not a member of and does not support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force." It is aimed, of course, at Communists or Communist sympathizers, and thus carries the implication that these are to be found especially in the colleges; for there is no comparable requirement to qualify for Federal loans in other fields.

What a howl would go up, for example, if a loyalty oath were to be required to qualify for receipt of a farm crop loan.

[From the Oregon Daily Statesman, Jan. 9, 1959]

MUNDT TEACHER OATH DISCRIMINATORY

The Federal aid to education bill passed at the last session of Congress provides scholarship loans for those pursuing advanced education. In the progress of the bill the Senate adopted an amendment offered by Senator MUNDT of South Dakota which denies loans to any applicant unless he signs an affidavit that he does not believe in and is not a member of and does not support any organization which believes in or teaches overthrow of the Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional means. It's the old "teacher's oath," long condemned by educators and defenders of civil liberties.

Our evening contemporary, supporting the Mundt amendment, asks why shouldn't the Government demand such oaths of allegiance from those to whom it is extending undergraduate loans. The answer to that is simple. The Government is not asking an oath of allegiance. If it were, as is commonly done of all public officials, the oath of allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States, there would be no objection. That is affirmative.

The Mundt oath singles out scholars for a particular kind of oath. It exposes them to possible perjury if sometime in the future it is claimed that some innocent-appearing organization to which they may have belonged was really subversive. Congress years ago set up an agency to sift out and designate the organizations which should be labeled "subversive," but it has not filed its lists—which is an indication of how hard it is to classify organizations.

No government money should go to traitors; but the oath should be affirmative, not negative; and penalties should be imposed on proof of subversion.

[From the Pendleton East-Oregonian, Dec. 26, 1958]

THE SAME REASONS HOLD

Some wise and influential persons, including the editor of the Oregon Statesman and former Governor of Oregon, Charles A. Sprague, had to talk long and hard to deter the Oregon Legislature in 1951 from passing a bill that would have required teachers to sign a non-Communist oath. The legislators were under great pressure to pass the bill. But Mr. Sprague and others were successful in convincing them that teachers should not be required to take an oath that was not required of others, and that the positive type of oath required of teachers (that they will uphold the Constitution of the United States and the State of Oregon) was sufficient.

Just before the Federal Education Act was passed, last August, Senator KARL MUNDT proposed and the U.S. Senate adopted by voice vote an amendment requiring every recipient of Federal loan, scholarship, or fellowship to take an oath that "he does not believe in, is not a member of, and does not support any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the U.S. Government by force or violence or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods."

The American Association of University Professors is asking that this provision be repealed. The argument made to the Oregon Legislature against this type of oath holds completely in this case. The Christian Science Monitor editorial suggests further reasons that the provision should be repealed:

Manifestly, neither America's college teaching profession nor America's general public wants disloyal persons receiving governmental educational aid—especially when there are so many qualified loyal persons eager to make use of it. Then why the objections?

The AAUP makes specifically the point that the law is so loosely drawn that those who take such an oath would be kept under threat of the penalties for perjury by those who might supply their own definitions of loyalty and disloyalty. Aside from this, there are certain simple and basic objections:

The loyalty oath is a deceptively futile device for screening out the disloyal. Those who do plot to overthrow the Government would not have the slightest compunction against swearing they do not.

And such a loyalty oath is both unfair and in a sense degrading. It singles out a particular class of persons and suggests that they are prone to disloyalty and must swear they are not. Why sully the fair name of education with such implications?

Mr. CARROLL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ACTIVITIES OF U.S. INFORMATION AGENCY IN LATIN AMERICA

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on February 9, 1959, the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] reported to the Senate on his 7-week trip to Latin America last fall. I regret very much that I was unable to be on the floor when our colleague spoke, because I found the account of his trip and the conclusions and recommendations contained in the memorandum which he placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD most interesting and provocative.

I wish at this time to add my congratulations and thanks to the Senator from Louisiana to those already voiced by the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK], the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

Several of the recommendations made by the Senator from Louisiana related to the activities of the U.S. Information Service in Latin America. Because these recommendations were largely critical in nature and raised serious questions about the effectiveness of our information service program in the Western Hemisphere, I asked the USIA to comment on that portion of the report dealing with the information agency. I would like to state briefly now, as I have notified the Senator that I would do, the main points made by the USIA concerning the criticisms contained in the report. I do so, not because I am an expert on the problems involved, but because I am deeply interested in the success of our overseas information program. I hope that presentation of the USIA side of the controversy will aid all of us to get a fuller picture of the Agency's efforts in the Americas.

Mr. President, I might add that I have sent to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana a copy of the remarks I propose to make. Because he is engaged in an important hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, he has sent word to me that he would be pleased to have me make these remarks this afternoon, even though he cannot be in the Chamber.

For some years I have been deeply interested in the program of the U.S. Information Agency. I have visited its offices in several countries abroad and have a strong feeling that its activities are very useful and, indeed, essential in connection with the implementation of the foreign policy of the United States. I hope we will not again this year repeat what I consider to have been the mistake we made 2 years ago, when we cut substantially the budget of that Agency in what appears to me now to have been a false effort toward economy. I think our action did substantial harm to the cause of sound foreign policy. I voted for that reduction then. I think I was wrong. I would not do so again.

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], recommended that "the press programs of the U.S. Information Agency in Central and South America be terminated at once as they are largely ineffectual," and press relations be handled by the "staffs of the diplomatic missions."

He charged that our press releases reach relatively few persons; that they are resisted as propaganda by most Latin Americans; and that they compete with the commercial wire services.

I am advised that the commercial news services which serve Latin America do not get to all people by any means, since many newspapers cannot afford such commercial service, and others cannot be serviced because of technical difficulties due to the remoteness of their locations. Thus, in a number of cases USIS is virtually the only source of information about the United States available to the local newspapers, and without the Agency's press service the only information about our country might come from the expanding information services of the Soviet Union in Latin America. In addition to the information and cultural sections of the Soviet regular and bloc missions, the Russians also have 73 binational centers in Latin America, an increase of 22 in 1958 alone, which disseminate Communist ideology. Tass and Pravda representatives in the area are also active. This would be the worst possible time for the United States to cut down on its information activities.

If USIS press activities in Latin America parallel those in other parts of the world with which I am familiar—which is largely, Mr. President, in Western Europe, and I am told that they do—a great amount of USIS material appears without indication of source in the newspapers and publications throughout the area. It is generally conceded that long and personal contact with newspaper editors and reporters is necessary to assure maximum distribution and use of press output, if the U.S. position on a wide variety of subjects is to be presented fully in the local press. It is highly questionable whether this job could be done adequately by Embassy officials working at it on a part-time basis.

I had occasion personally to investigate this matter in Italy some time ago. It was entirely clear to me at that time that we could not ask our overworked Embassy officials, whose entire time is taken up with the duties of dealing with the officials of the Italian Government and staffs of other embassies with whom they have mutual problems, to maintain relationships with the working press which does the job of the USIS officials in foreign countries. I am reasonably confident the same situation applies in Latin America.

This does not mean that USIS competes with the commercial wire services. The Agency attempts to produce, not news as such, but supplementary information containing official statements on American policy, features on life in the United States, and other material which the commercial wire services do not handle. The USIA headquarters here in Washington has received no recent complaints of competition from the commercial wire services which service this area according to the advice which has reached me.

Another recommendation made by the Senator from Louisiana was that radio and television programs should be reevaluated to eliminate programs in places where television reception is only nominal and radios are regarded as curiosities.

It is the contention of the USIA that radios have long ceased to be curiosities in South America, and indeed that the main trouble with radio broadcasting there is abundance, not scarcity. There are estimated to be 1,700 radio stations and 22 million radio sets on the continent.

Television is now growing in South America at the spectacular rate at which it grew in this country a few years ago. There are now 75 operating stations in 13 Latin-American countries, and the number of TV receivers rose by 45 percent in 1958 to a total of approximately 2⅓ million sets. At the present the USIS does confine its telecasting efforts to those five posts where the concentration of receivers is heaviest. Telecasting elsewhere is reported to cost the U.S. Government virtually nothing since air time is usually free, and the occasional programing consists of providing, upon request, films already available in the USIS film libraries.

The Senator criticized the USIS salary structure as being too high and cited the sums paid in salary and allowances for post, quarters, transportation, hardship, and representation for the six officers who head the USIS programs in six different Latin countries.

There is, strictly speaking, no USIS salary structure, because USIS officials receive the same salaries and allowances as are set for the Foreign Service of the United States, and each officer in the information program is compensated in accordance with standardized Foreign Service classifications and regulations equally applicable to all U.S. Foreign Service personnel.

The first example cited indicates that in the last year the chief information officer in Venezuela received $12,000 salary, $3,600 post allowance, $6,000 quarters allowance, $125 transportation allowance, and $48 representation allowance—total $21,893.

I ask Senators to note the size of the representation allowance.

The total sum may appear to be large, although frankly it does not, to me, but it is not hard to understand why the special allowances are so high when the cost of living statistics for Venezuela are examined. In Caracas, a can of Campbell's soup costs 75 cents; a hamburger $1.50, and a taxi ride from the airport to the Tamanaco Hotel $12. Compensation should be judged in this perspective, not in the abstract.

I suggest that the salary and allowances for the USIS chief officer in Venezuela are not out of line if the factors of the high cost of living are taken into account.

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana praised the USIS program of encouraging the establishment of binational centers to provide facilities for the teaching of English, business courses, and the presentation of cultural programs, and so forth. The Senator charged, however, that payment of U.S. personnel called "grantees," in these centers by the State Department under the exchange-of-persons program or by the USIA from general funds is illegal or improper, and that United States payment of the resident American staff of these centers automatically impaired their effectiveness, which results largely from their complete independence from U.S. control.

I am advised that the USIA, and its predecessor agencies, have been paying the salaries of the American personnel of these binational centers for nearly 20 years, and that the State Department has and pays for no permanent personnel attached to the centers and provides only an occasional guest lecturer.

The legal authority for this action by the USIA is found in title 22, United States Code, sections 1448 and 1471(1), and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that cited sections from the United States Code be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITLE 22—UNITED STATES CODE

SEC. 1448. Assistance to certain institutions abroad founded or sponsored by U.S. citizens.

The Secretary is authorized to provide for assistance to schools, libraries, and community centers abroad, founded or sponsored by citizens of the United States, and serving as demonstration centers for methods and practices employed in the United States. In assisting any such schools, however, the Secretary shall exercise no control over their educational policies and shall in no case furnish assistance of any character which is not in keeping with the free democratic principles and the established foreign policy of the United States. (Jan. 27, 1948, ch. 36, title II, sec. 203, 62 Stat. 7.)

SEC. 1471. Authority of Secretary of State.

In carrying out the purposes of this chapter, the Secretary is authorized, in addition to and not in limitation of the authority otherwise vested in him—

(1) In carrying out subchapter II of this chapter, within the limitation of such appropriations as the Congress may provide, to make grants of money, services, or materials to State and local governmental institutions in the United States, to governmental institutions in other countries, and to individuals and public or private nonprofit organizations both in the United States and in other countries;

NOTE.—Reorganization Plan No. 8 of 1953 transferred the above-mentioned functions from the Secretary of State to the Director of USIA.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, furthermore, a large measure of the eminently successful record of the centers which the Senator commended so highly, is directly attributable to the efforts of American personnel who have devoted their careers, on Government salaries, to promoting international understanding.

In fact, the local boards of directors, composed largely of prominent host country citizens have actively solicited the USIA to assign Americans to the staff of their centers in several cases recently.

In El Salvador, for instance, the Foreign Minister and the Minister of Public Works, both of whom are coming to the United States with President Lemus next week, have asked the USIA to find a replacement for Mr. George P. McCallum, the U.S. Director who recently resigned from the staff of the Binational Center in San Salvador, and this subject is considered to be of such importance that it has been placed on the presidential agenda for the coming visit.

In the center in Belem, Brazil, by way of further example, an American, Miss Bernice Schmidt, did such a first-rate job in her 2 years there that she raised enrollment from 200 to 1,000 and the center was completely self-sustaining. Since Miss Schmidt's transfer to another post last year, the local board reports that attendance has fallen off, the cultural and academic programs have deteriorated, and the center has been run at a deficit for the first time. The local board has petitioned the USIA to send another American to the post as soon as possible.

I am confident that the USIA officials will have a full and fair opportunity in hearings later in the session to present these and many other points which can be made in favor of continued and stepped-up efforts in our information program in Latin America. Perhaps though, this brief presentation will serve to give a somewhat fuller orientation as to the scope of the Agency's operations in Latin America than would otherwise be possible in advance of those hearings.

I should like to repeat that I feel indebted to the senior Senator from Louisiana for his report. It is a magnificent report. It has been printed, and I hold a copy in my hand. It is some 535 pages long. It includes a review of the status of the United States position in each one of the Latin American countries which he visited and is a valuable contribution to the discussion of our foreign policy and its implementation in the areas covered. It has served to focus our attention on our relations with our closest neighbors, which we have tended too often to neglect as recent events clearly show. I hope that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] will continue for many years to come to take this annual inspection tour and to give us the benefit of his views as he has done this year and in the past.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I hope we are not going to cut back the U.S. Information Service in Latin America, because I am confident it is doing first-class work, and is helping materially to increase the cooperation and understanding which it is so necessary to develop between the Latin American Republics and the United States of America.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN SENATE APPROPRIATIONS PROCEDURE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the Communist ideology is based in a large part on a prediction made by the early writers of Communist philosophy, and uniformly adhered to by the Kremlin powers over the years, that the countries founded on the economic basis of a free enterprise system would collapse from within. The prediction that free enterprise in the United States will succumb to the pressures generated by communism and socialism was reiterated by Mr. Khrushchev in a broadcast to the American people in June 1957, as follows:

I can prophesy that your grandchildren in America will live under socialism. And please do not be afraid of that. Your grandchildren will not understand how their grandparents did not understand the progressive nature of a socialistic society.

When the predictions of the collapse of free enterprise systems were first made, and indeed until very recently, they appeared, to all sensible and thinking men to be absurd. In our own country, private enterprise had enabled us to achieve, in our short history, a standard of living and a freedom from want that was and is unequaled anywhere in the world. The accomplishments of individual, unfettered initiative, as demonstrated under our constitutional republican form of government, stand as a beacon of inspiration and hope to all mankind.

Recently, Mr. President, there have been indications that many were becoming less dubious of what had earlier been considered only wishful thinking by the Communists—that our economic system would collapse from within. This reappraisal has not been caused by any defect which has appeared in our private enterprise system, nor by any lag in our continually rising standard of living. The doubt is attributable to the irresponsible fiscal policy that has characterized our National Government in recent years; a fiscal policy which has resulted in a precarious fiscal condition, and which has contributed substantially to a sickening inflationary spiral.

Mr. President, to anyone who was unaware that the motivation of those of us who share in the making of fiscal policy was basically humanitarian, it could appear that we were deliberately contributing to the fulfillment of the dreadful predictions of our internal economic collapse. It is only common sense to expect that the most productive country in the world could operate its National Government on a pay-as-you-go basis. At least this is not too much to expect in times when we are not at war or other grave emergency, nor in the throes of a staggering depression.

That does not appear to be the case. In the last 20 years, the Federal budget has grown to nearly seven times its 1939 size. Since 1900, we have been able to operate within our income in only 25 fiscal years, and have exceeded our income with expenditures in 34 years. Even this distressing comparison does not indicate the depth to which we have sunk, for an examination of the last 20 years shows that only one-fourth of them were years of balanced budgets. Last year, fiscal 1959, saw the deficit climb to a new peacetime high of almost $13 billion. Despite the already astronomical size of the national debt, this was an addition of 4.6 percent.

It is easy to understand why the average citizen of our country finds figures so large as those of our debt almost incomprehensible. Only when it is reduced to a figure such as $5,240 for every family in the United States, do they realize under what an obligation they have been placed. Were we to attempt immediate, direct collection of even a minor portion of the debt, as for instance last year's deficit, the realization would be brought home with an impact. It would require the confiscation of all personal incomes above $4,000 to pay the fiscal 1958 deficit.

While the average citizen may have difficulty comprehending the unbelievable size of the national debt, there is one resulting condition that is readily understandable. This is the pinch of inflation. It makes itself felt daily at the shopping counters and cash registers all over the country. While not so impressive as the experience of being unable to stretch the family income for the bare essentials, the following figures on comparative purchasing power of incomes in 1939 and 1959 indicate the harshness of inflation, particularly to retirees, annuitants, and others with fixed incomes. To maintain an equal purchasing power, one who earned $2,000 in 1939 must earn $4,806 in 1959; one who earned $5,000 in 1939 must earn $13,604 in 1959; and one whose income in 1939 was $10,000 must now earn $30,971 to maintain the identical purchasing power.

Mr. President, although I am no economist, I realize that factors other than Government deficit spending are contributing to the inflation which we are experiencing and which threatens to grow much worse. I am cognizant that such things as the relation of wages to productivity, and the relation of profits to prices, have a direct influence on the inflationary spiral. Despite the contributions of these forces, which are themselves responsive to Government policies, common sense dictates that Government policy, and fiscal policy in particular, is the basic cause of the inflation of our currency.

Mr. President, not only has deficit spending by the Federal Government been primarily responsible for inflation, but the cycle has now run its course, so that the very inflation promoted by deficit spending is making further deficit spending even more dangerous than it has been in the past. There is a growing reluctance to lend money to the Federal Government at any rate of interest. This is well illustrated by the fact that in the Treasury's latest debt refinancing attempt, the attrition rate has increased to 22 percent, as compared to the normal 10 percent. The obligations which were sought to be refinanced bore interest rates of 1⅞ and 2½ percent, and the offer was to renew them with securities paying 3¾ and 4 percent. No realist can doubt that, in the absence of inflation, there would have been much less than the normal 10-percent rejection of the offer at these substantially increased rates of interest. This illustrates that the rate in inflation is in excess, by far, of the prevailing interest rates. Investors and savers have by now been thoroughly impressed by the disastrous results of investing in fixed-income securities. The current round of Government borrowing was necessitated by the maturity of $9.1 billion of debt obligations. The sum sought to be borrowed to cover the attrition is $1.5 billion. Lest we console ourselves with the thought that it could be more, we should remember that during this year a total of $42 billion of Government securities will fall due.

It is obvious that as far as borrowing is concerned, we are nearing the end of our rope. It will be extremely difficult to continue securing private funds for refinancing the existing debt. Even if we manage to hold the debt at its present level, it is also evident that unless inflation is checked immediately, the Congress will be faced with an increase in the statutory interest ceiling, passed in 1918, of 4¼ percent on national debt securities.

Mr. President, there are those who would rely on a hoped-for increase in our gross national product, and the increased Government revenue resulting therefrom, to remedy the impasse with which we are faced. The same people would hold the line on taxes and, in some cases, increase them. An increase in gross national product will undoubtedly help, and I fervently hope that those who predict an 8 percent increase will have their prognosis justified. As a realist, however, I cannot forget that the only year in which there has been an increase in gross national product of 8 percent was following 1954's $7.5 billion tax cut. Additionally, in all candor, we must admit that a measurement of gross national product increase, when measured in dollars, has a built-in inflation factor.

As much as I should like to see our fiscal problems painlessly solved by a big increase in national product, to place any reliance in what is essentially wishful thinking would be an expansion of our irresponsibility.

We should not overlook any possible avenue of escape from our dilemma, no matter how fantastic it may be. Along this line, we have heard advanced proposals, truly fantastic, that we should raise taxes in order to meet the expenditures which we are making. As unrealistic, impractical, confiscatory, and incentive-destroying as is any thought of further raising our already burdensome and stifling taxes, such a course would be sounder, on a long-term basis of pay-as-you-go economy, than our present bent-on-deficit-spending course we are now pursuing. An increase in taxes at least offers the hope that the American people would rise up and demand a curtailment of spending. There is, however, no real necessity for any general tax increase.

Mr. President, there is a practical and effective course to lead us from the road of fulfillment of Communist prophecy of our internal economic collapse. It is the course of economy and fiscal soundness. It requires a quality which is notably lacking in the Supreme Court, and of which the Congress and the administration have not indicated an excess. I speak of the quality of restraint. In this case, I mean legislative restraint. The legislative restraint, of which I speak, should be applied to spending.

The American public is ready and clamoring for restraint in Government spending. Too often, in answer to their clamor, they are told that we must continue to spend in order to insure a strong national defense. There is some truth in the answer, for we must maintain a strong defense posture, regardless of the cost. I am not satisfied, personally, that we are spending enough in this vital field. Nevertheless, this is not a wholly true answer, for it is deceptive. It would leave the public to believe that we could not reduce overall spending drastically without endangering our defense posture. This is not true. The fallacy is well illustrated by the fact that defense spending for 1959 will be $4.3 billion lower than the 1953 Korean war defense budget, while nondefense expenditures for 1959 are estimated at $9.2 billion above the 1953 level. Also, nondefense spending for fiscal 1959 is to be increased by $5.9 billion, against an increase of only $2 billion for defense purposes.

Spending can be cut without injury to our defense posture by reducing such items, among others, as foreign aid, public housing, and urban renewal, by declining to provide Federal funds for the fields of community facilities and area redevelopment, and by rejecting any increase in Federal aid to education. Even desirable programs should be postponed until Federal expenditures can be reduced well within our income. Special interest groups must not be allowed to sap the strength from our free-enterprise system, regardless of their attempts to increase their doles from the United States Treasury and the taxpayers' pockets.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I am glad to yield to my friend the distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator mentioned ways in which expenditures had increased. I assume he is cognizant of the fact that the high interest rate policy pursued by the administration, under what I believe to be the guise of fighting inflation, when actually it is only adding fuel to the fires of inflation, has cost the Government two and a half billion dollars a year, as of now. If we had just that much money available, just the increase in the interest rate on our debt management, it would go a long way toward providing the necessary funds to provide an adequate defense for this country, which, after all, as the Senator has so well pointed out, should be our first undertaking, so that this Nation will be adequately defended.

Mr. THURMOND. There is no question that the interest is costing the Government tremendous sums of money, which ought to go for other important purposes. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, direct deficit spending by the Federal Government is only one of the fields in which we must exercise a so-far unexhibited degree of restraint. There is a corollary field deserving the same treatment—that of Government lending. Most of the American public is at least aware of the fact that the Federal Government is spending vast sums, if not of the exact extent of these expenditures. I fear, however, that they are not nearly so well informed of the extent to which the Federal Government has usurped the function of private lending institutions. It is estimated that direct Federal loans on June 30, 1959, will be at a level of $21.8 billion, and that insured or guaranteed loans will be at a level of $70.1 billion. This is a total of $91.9 billion, for which the full faith and credit of the United States is pledged. To emphasize the rate at which the Government's participation is accelerating in this field, compare the fact that in 1958, the net addition to private debt, both of business and individuals, was $20 billion, while in the fiscal year 1959, the net addition of Government-backed credit, alone, will be $15 billion. It would appear that nothing could be more absurd than for an entity—which is over $283 billion in debt, which has no capacity to produce wealth, and which must rely as a parasite on taxpayers for income—to plunge head over heels into a program of lending. But we go even further into the absurd. We are lending much of this public money at an interest rate below the interest rate which the Government must pay to borrow the money we lend. Let us not delude ourselves. The great majority of citizens may not be aware of this voluminous pledge of credit; but it is quite evident that those, from whom we seek to obtain funds to finance our monstrous debt, are computing these lending programs in the liability column of the Federal Government. Undoubtedly, this factor, also, is reflected in the attrition rate on maturing Government securities. Ours is not a fiscal policy to inspire confidence of investors.

Mr. President, the time has come to set our house in order. No individual would receive, or expect, any respect, were he to conduct, if such were possible, his personal or business finances as the Federal Government conducts its fiscal policies. I suspect that if the American public were fully aware of how their Government's fiscal policy is conducted, we who make that policy would have to seek any respect we thought we deserved from a position of retirement in private life. We are facing a fiscal crisis every bit as grave, and with just as serious consequences, as that posed by the threat of armed conflict. A loss, in either case, means the destruction of our country as we know it.

I reiterate, there is no substitute for the exercise of restraint in spending and lending by the Government. To better enable us to restrain ourselves, there are certain procedural steps which could, and should, be taken. I now address myself to one of such procedural steps.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States is a document of truly inspiring greatness. The wisdom which contributed to its composition was unbounded. Almost without exception, the governmental policies which lead us down the road to despair and frustration prove to have violated, in letter or spirit, or both, some provision of this great document.

Article I, section 9, clause 7, of the Constitution provides as follows:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

Mr. President, we are surely violating the spirit, and probably the letter, of this clause of the Constitution. We are allowing money which has never been appropriated to be withdrawn from the Treasury. There are two principal methods by which our deviations are effectuated. One is by the authorization of direct borrowing from the Treasury, by legislative acts which have not followed the prescribed appropriations procedure; the other is through the use of the much utilized contract authority, or commitment authorization.

While we in Congress are all familiar with these procedures, I should like to cite specific examples of each, so that there may be no misunderstanding of the existence of the abuse I propose we correct.

There is no better example of the bypassing of the appropriations procedure by the authorization of direct borrowing from the Treasury than one contained in the omnibus housing bill, S. 57, which passed the Senate earlier this month. I refer to the provisions of section 304 of title III on urban renewal. Section 102(e) of the Housing Act of 1949 authorized the Housing Administrator to make direct borrowings from the Treasury to finance urban renewal projects subject to a $1 billion limitation. Section 304 of title III of the housing bill, which passed the Senate on February 5 of this year, would repeal the $1 billion limitation on these borrowings, and make the sky the limit. Direct borrowings from the Treasury are unjustifiable even when limited, and if this ceiling repeal becomes law, the attrition rate on Government obligations will reflect it immediately; and even worse, the Treasury Department will have another addition to the attrition which it must now already attempt to secure on the open market. I might add, Mr. President, short-term revenue anticipation notes are only a stopgap measure, which will merely postpone the inevitable day when the Treasury Department must seek to place long-term securities.

The same housing bill contains just as flagrant an example of the commitment authority method of bypassing appropriations procedure. Section 405 of title IV of the omnibus housing bill authorizes the Housing Administrator to enter contracts for annual contributions for the construction of 35,000 additional public housing units. This is in addition, incidentally, to the renewal of the authorization for 45,000 other units. The total cost of this commitment for 35,000 new units cannot be computed positively at this time, for we have no way to know what these units will cost, especially in view of the continually spiraling inflation. We do know that the present maximum is $17,000 per unit. Even if the average cost is only $10,000 per unit, this commitment will involve approximately $84 billion over the period of the next 40 years. To be sure, it is most unlikely that this commitment will have to be paid in full by the Federal Government, but a major portion of it will undoubtedly fall on the shoulders of the Federal Government; and the full faith and credit of our Government is pledged on all of it. This money is committed as soon as the contracts are executed, without any appropriations procedure having been utilized.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that were these and the many other programs, which utilize direct borrowings and contract authority in lieu of appropriations, to follow the normal appropriations procedure through Congress, there would be provided additional incentive and opportunity for Congress to apply the admirable quality of restraint on the outgo from the Treasury. We would also be adhering to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. The latter is desirable, not only because the Constitution is the basic law of the land and was meant to control in our system of government, but also because the entire country would benefit by following its prescriptions.

In order to remedy the defects of our present course of bypassing appropriations procedure, I submit for appropriate reference a resolution, which would modify the existing Senate rules. The resolution provides that any bill or resolution which the Senate seeks to consider, which authorizes direct borrowings from the Treasury, or contains authority for contract commitments of U.S. funds, would first have to be referred to the Senate Committee on Appropriations for its approval. I sincerely hope that this initial step of an effort to prove the absurdity of the predictions of our internal collapse will meet with early and favorable action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 81) submitted by Mr. THURMOND was received and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That rule XVI of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended (1) by striking out the heading thereto and inserting in lieu thereof "Amendments to Appropriation Bills and Amendments Creating a Charge on the Treasury," and (2) by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"8. No amendment to a bill or joint resolution shall be received or considered if it authorizes (A) expenditures from debt receipts, or the creation of obligations by contract in advance of appropriations, and (B) is not moved by direction of a standing committee of the Senate."

SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Committee on Appropriations, to consist of 27 Senators, to which committee shall be referred—

"(1) All proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government; and

"(2) All proposed legislation (other than legislation within the purview of paragraph (1) above, or relating to claims against the United States) authorizing expenditures from debt receipts, or the creation of obligations by contract in advance of appropriations; except that any proposed legislation carrying such authority which relates to a substantive matter within the jurisdiction of any other standing committee of the Senate shall be referred first to such committee."

MEETING OF LABOR LEADERS WITH MIKOYAN

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, it is a truism of diplomacy that one of the factors bearing on decisions for peace or war, is the misjudgment of the mind, strength, and determination of the people of other nations. If this is valid for our time—and I believe it is—then it seems to me that the five United States labor leaders who spoke plainly to Soviet Deputy Premier Mikoyan during his recent visit performed a major service for peace. They gave to him a clear picture of the desire of our people and Government for peace, but our determination to defend our freedom.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks an article entitled "U.S. Labor Versus Mikoyan," written by John Herling, and published in The New Leader for February 2, 1959, together with an editorial note which describes it as virtually a verbatim account of those labor leaders' meetings with Mr. Mikoyan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the New Leader reports as being present at the meeting with Mr. Mikoyan, five vice presidents of the AFL–CIO: Mr. James B. Carey, president of the International Union of Electrical Workers; Mr. Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers; Mr. William L. Doherty, president of the Letter Carriers' Union; Mr. Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers Union; and Mr. Carl Feller, president of the Brewery Workers' Union. Also noted as being present were the IUE secretary-treasurer, Mr. Al Hartnett, and Mr. George L. P. Weaver, assistant to Mr. James B. Carey.

This report has, I believe, immediate and longrun historical importance. I call particular attention to four facts made clear in Mr. Herling's report:

First, following a dinner with United States businessmen and political leaders, Mr. Mikoyan took the initiative, through the Soviet Ambassador, of having labor leaders to meet with him.

Second, the meeting was to have been at lunch in the Soviet Embassy. There the labor leaders might not have been as free as guests, to speak as plainly and forcibly as they desired.

Therefore, out of years of experience in negotiation, including firsthand encounters with trained Communist agents seeking to dominate union affairs locally, nationally, and internationally, the labor leaders invited Mr. Mikoyan to meet with them at the Philip Murray Bldg., in Washington, IUE headquarters.

Third, Mr. Mikoyan's seeking the meeting, permitted and made it necessary for the labor leaders to give him the plain, unvarnished truth about their understanding of Soviet acts and policies, past, present, and future.

These men are accustomed in their daily work to talking to the point. This is what they did with Mr. Mikoyan, and, whether he yet realizes it or not, I believe that, from his own and the Soviet Government's point of view, as well as our own, the meeting was one of the most important of his entire visit.

Mr. Walter Reuther, as I have said, was one of the labor leaders present.

While I was serving as U.S. Ambassador in India, I observed his representation of this country and the labor movement during his tour of India. He came to India in 1955, shortly after the visit of Mr. Khrushchev and then President Bulganin of the Soviet Union. He visited many of the cities and development sites which they had visited. He was received warmly by the Prime Minister of India, Mr. Nehru, and other government officials. Also, he was received enthusiastically by the leaders and members of the growing trade union movement in India and by the people of India—intellectual groups, university students, businessmen, and the rank and file—both privately and in the course of many public speeches which he made.

I heard several of the speeches which Mr. Reuther made. In his speeches and discussions, he gave a clear portrait of the American economic system, impartially giving credit to both labor and management, and pointing out that through experience and legislative action the American economic system had long since achieved for America's workers, by democratic means, opportunities and an advance in standards of living such as the Communists had promised but had not been able to achieve, even through ruthless and coercive means.

Mr. Reuther was an effective spokesman for democratic values, pointing out that peoples living under Communist regimes are denied individual freedoms accepted as a matter of course by the people of our own country and other true democracies, including India.

For all these reasons, I commend the article in the New Leader to Members of the Congress and to the American people.

EXHIBIT 1

U.S. LABOR VERSUS MIKOYAN

(By John Herling)

(Much newspaper space, and a corresponding amount of radio and television time, was devoted to what Soviet Deputy Premier Anastas I. Mikoyan has himself described as the "reasonable approach on the part of American businessmen" to his visit here. Relatively little coverage, however, was given to one of Mikoyan's less pleasant encounters in this country: his luncheon with five U.S. labor leaders. In his first Kremlin press conference after his return home, Mikoyan observed that the "rudest statements" about the Soviet Union came from these union leaders. He noted, too, that there was "strong dispute" at the luncheon, and that United Auto Workers' President Walter Reuther came at him strongly on the questions of Hungary and Berlin, but he repulsed the attacks. Here we present what is virtually a verbatim account of that meeting. John Herling writes a syndicated column on the labor scene for leading American newspapers; he also produces John Herling's Labor Letter, an authoritative news report on activities in U.S. trade unions.)

WASHINGTON.—Soviet Deputy Premier Anastas I. Mikoyan, who has just returned home from his 2-week visit to this country, indicated a desire to meet the representatives of American labor within 24 hours of his arrival here. Following the dinner given for him on his first night in Washington by Motion Picture Association President Eric Johnston, which was attended by business and political leaders, Soviet Ambassador Mikhail Menshikov telephoned the home of James B. Carey, president of the International Union of Electrical Workers, whose headquarters on Washington's 16th Street are directly across from the Soviet Embassy. Menshikov said it would be a great pleasure if Carey would come to lunch at the Embassy the next day. Carey thought a moment and replied, "It might be more interesting if Mr. Mikoyan and you would lunch with some of my colleagues at the Philip Murray Building, the union headquarters, tomorrow."

"But it would be difficult on such short notice for them to assemble," the Soviet Ambassador said. Carey allayed the Ambassador's fears and urged, "Come on to our house." The next day Mikoyan and his party strode across the street with police escort to the IUE's headquarters—one of the more modest union buildings in Washington. Reporters and photographers who had been using the union lobby to keep out of the cold while waiting for Mikoyan's exits and entrances at the Embassy found themselves with a new story.

On the seventh floor, in the Woodrow Wilson room, waiting for Mikoyan, Menshikov, interpeter Oleg Troyanovsky, son of the former Soviet Ambassador to the United States, and Serge Mikoyan, son of the Deputy Premier, were five vice presidents of the AFL–CIO: Carey, United Auto Workers' president, Walter P. Reuther, Letter Carriers' president, William C. Doherty, Communication Workers' president, Joseph A. Beirne, and Brewery Workers' president, Karl Feller. Also present were IUE Secretary-Treasurer Al Hartnett and Carey's assistant, George L. P. Weaver.

Carey asked Mikoyan what he would have to drink. Vodka was there, if he wished. "What are you having?" asked Mikoyan, "I like to drink what my host drinks." "Scotch," said Carey. So it was Scotch.

Carey raised his glass to toast the Four Freedoms, since this day, January 6, marked the 18th anniversary of the announcement of the Four Freedoms by Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Moreover, he said, the first of these freedoms was freedom of speech. This, said Carey, we are prepared to practice today. Mikoyan simply responded by assuring the union leaders of his admiration for FDR and the Four Freedoms. Then Carey wondered whether Mikoyan was over here to show Republicans how to hold on to power, since he had managed to do so through the "administrations" of Lenin, Stalin, Malenkov, and now Khrushchev, but the light tone didn't last long.

Reuther faced Mikoyan: "Both the Soviet Union and America have the technological capacity to destroy each other," he said, "so war is out of the question as a means of settling differences. The total destructive power of nuclear weapons makes peace a condition of human survival. The only war the American labor movement and the American people are interested in is a war against mankind's ancient enemies—poverty, disease, hunger and illiteracy."

Mikoyan could hardly wait for his interpreter to finish to agree with the sentiments just expressed. "In fact," he said, "the Soviet Union does not want any kind of war, even with the old conventional weapons and methods. War of any kind is an immoral method of settling disputes. But the Soviet Union would support a war of peoples for freedom, against aggression and for self-determination."

"That goes to show," said Reuther to Mikoyan, "it's easy for the Soviet Union and America to agree on 'pious phrases,' but the test of sincerity and good faith does not rest in general declarations, but in their practical implementation."

"Take the current crisis in Germany," Reuther went on. "All representative groups in the United States consider the Government of East Germany a puppet of the Soviet Union. The current Berlin crisis is made in Moscow. The Soviet Government is trying to exploit the situation of Berlin and the division in Germany for tactical reasons in the cold war. How can the Soviet Union reconcile its professed desire for peace with the fact that time after time it creates new pressure points and the very tension that today threatens world peace?"

(By this time, the excellent meal catered by the nearby Statler Hilton was almost forgotten. The original plan was to have an orderly buffet, with each man moving to the table to pick and choose. But the talk began so quickly and maintained such a steady beat that the waiters, not wishing to see the food go to waste, finally dished it out and served each discussant where he sat.)

Mikoyan then gave in some detail the history and background of the leaders of East Germany. Many, he said, are workers and trade unionists and former members of the Social Democratic and the Christian Democratic Parties. "Certainly," he insisted, "the Soviet Union would not permit Chancellor Konrad Adenauer to dictate the terms for a unified Germany."

"Well," Reuther shot back, "the free world would not consent to have the terms for a unified Germany dictated in the Kremlin. This is a decision the German people should make through a democratic vote, participated in by all the people of Germany, and supervised by a commission of the United Nations."

Mikoyan retorted somewhat sharply that the East German Government was "democratically" chosen, and he again cited the character of their leaders as proof.

"Oh yes," Reuther said, "I have some personal understanding and experience of the background of political parties in Germany. I was in Berlin at the time of one of Hitler's so-called elections in 1933. Let me tell you, there is no essential difference between a vote under Hitler and the votes conducted in the Soviet Union and in East Germany. Why? Because under all three there is only one party for the electorate and only one list of candidates. Such an election is not a democratic expression of the democratic will of the people."

Mikoyan peered at Reuther. He said emphatically as if replying to Reuther's point, "An important consideration in discussing the future of Germany is the fact that in East Germany there is social ownership of the means of production, and the fact that the workers own and control the means of production."

But Reuther would not be sidetracked "Your claim," he said, "that the East German Government is independent of Moscow domination might have carried somewhat more weight if you had made such a claim before Soviet military power intervened to crush a representative government in Hungary—but not now, after the brutal intervention of Soviet troops in Hungary. This dissolved any possible illusions about so-called political independence from Kremlin control of any of the satellite countries. If the East German Government did anything which displeased the Kremlin in foreign policy, the Soviet Government would move in and crush the East German Government in Hungarian style."

Here Jim Carey recalled the basic error of the Soviet trade unionists in the World Federation of Trade Unions, with which the Congress of Industrial Organizations, the British Trades Union Congress, and others were affiliated until 1949. Mikoyan replied that the trade union centers of the West had demonstrated impatience and intolerance and had not given the WFTU a real opportunity to work out its problems. Speaking from experience as a CIO delegate to the WFTU in Paris, and to the Soviet trade unions in Moscow in the mid-1940's, Carey retorted:

"The trade unions of the West made every reasonable effort to work out an agreement, but the Soviet Union itself made the serious error of trying to capture the official machinery of the WFTU through Soviet control of Communist-dominated unions throughout the world. In this way, the Soviet Government sought to use the world trade union movement as a vehicle for Soviet foreign policy."

To this Mikoyan used a softer answer: "If the Russian trade unionists made mistakes, no doubt the unions in the West also made mistakes during that period. We should not permit such mistakes to keep us in conflict any more than neighbors should allow past mistakes to dominate future relations."

Reuther abruptly brought the discussion back to what he called the global error of Soviet propaganda, which he said had changed little in the past 40 years: "Your propaganda has no relation to the present-day world as far as America is concerned. The Kremlin might as well cut off its efforts to propagandize the American workers, because it will not be successful in overthrowing our economic and social system."

Then Reuther recited rapidly the facts of the transformation of conditions in the automotive industry. "We still have problems," he said, "but we are able to participate in solving these problems through trade union action and as citizens." Reuther also pointed out that the Soviets themselves admit that American workers enjoy a standard of living far above that in the Soviet Union:

"That's why they resent Soviet propaganda which is directed at them and other workers and which would have the world believe that the American workers are wage slaves who are being exploited by a ruthless and inhuman system of 'Wall Street capitalism.' It's about time that the Soviet Union quit playing this broken propaganda record."

Mikoyan, trying to turn the conversational tables, retorted, "If the record is broken, how can we play it?" Then, all Americans present had to explain that a "broken record" is one that is cracked and out of date. At this point Mikoyan smiled a little and agreed that the matter ought to be looked into.

Carey then picked up the theme of the evolutionary advances in the American labor movement since Mikoyan's last visit more than 20 years ago, saying that improvements have been registered not only economically but also in political and social areas. Mikoyan insisted that here the American trade union leaders were wrong again in their supposition that Russia is not aware of the higher standard of living of the American workers. "In fact," he said, "we constantly use this fact as an incentive and example to Russian workers to improve their production."

For a few minutes the discussion veered to talk about literature. The Americans brought up the subject of Boris Pasternak and Dr. Zhivago. Mikoyan would not say whether he had read the book. But he launched into a personal attack on Pasternak and tried to dispose of him as "the son of a millionaire" who saw through the eyes of the old regime.

This question of freedom to read was further illustrated by an incident Reuther recalled for Mikoyan which occurred during a visit made by a Russian trade union delegation to the Detroit headquarters of the United Auto Workers shortly after the end of World War II. The Russian visitors were taken into the union library and they looked over the book stacks. One particular volume caught the eye of a Russian visitor, and he beckoned the others to come over to gaze at the title. Afterward, the UAW guides went back to see what book held such a fascination for their Soviet visitors. It was Leon Trotsky's "History of the Russian Revolution." Mikoyan listened to the story and was not amused.

At this point, Joseph Beirne steered the conversation back to foreign policy: "Mr. Mikoyan, it is impossible for American workers to develop a faith and trust in the Soviet's stated belief in self-determination for smaller nations, with the memory of Hungary still fresh in their minds. Here was a situation where the workers of Hungary, attempting to achieve self-determination, were brutally slain or imprisoned by Soviet military power."

And Beirne asked—and the same question was later raised by William C. Doherty—whether the Soviet Government would guarantee absolute freedom of movement and access to an American trade-union delegation to the Soviet Union. Specifically, he asked, "Would such a delegation be able to visit prisons and labor camps and talk to workers on the job and in their homes without interference?"

Mikoyan quickly replied by assuring the freedom of an American trade-union delegation to travel and visit any place in Russia except restricted areas, atomic-energy and missile installations. But pushed again to discuss Hungary, he refused to take up the subject on the ground that it would take considerable time to examine the subject properly and refute the American charges.

At this point the American trade-union leaders said: "All right, let's take the time." But Mikoyan shrugged this off with a remark that the labor leaders in the room were "blindly" supporting American foreign policy, which he characterized as "aggressive" in Guatemala, when the Jacobe Arbenz regime was overthrown, and in the U.S. landings in Lebanon.

"All right," the Americans said again, "we'll answer questions about Guatemala and Lebanon when you have answered ours on Hungary."

At this point, the American labor leaders let Mikoyan know that they understood how closely identified he was with the suppression of the Hungarian revolution of 1956.

Reuther then picked up Mikoyan's reference to U.S. labor's "blind" support of U.S. foreign policy. "Now," he said, "on Berlin, the American labor movement supports the Government's foreign policy. But American labor leaders freely disagree, often and publicly, with our Government's policy, without fear of going to jail. No Russian leader of a Soviet trade union could truthfully say he can exercise such a right to disagree with the Soviet Government."

Mikoyan seemed about to protest, but was silent.

When Beirne brought up the fact that the American people and trade unionists had frequent and regular opportunities to influence the direction of the U.S. Government, as witnessed in the recent election, Mikoyan tried to take the offensive. Ironically, he remarked he was glad to hear that the American trade unions had such influence, that he really had not realized that "you could exercise such influence on your Government." Then he pointed to what seemed to him sure-fire evidence that the United States had a second-rate labor movement: "You do not even have a labor party in America."

As a riposte, Carey made a fragile joke about the Soviet Union not having a capitalist party. But Mikoyan disregarded this and said: "The leadership of the Soviet Union sees no difference whatsoever between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party."

Then Reuther shot back with a comment that seemed to stop Mikoyan for a full minute:

"Mr. Mikoyan, let me tell you that programmatically there is more difference between the policies of the Republican Party and the Democratic Party than there was between the Menshevik Party and the Bolshevik Party at the time of their split."

Finally Mikoyan spoke, "This was true only during a short period."

Again Beirne came back to the question of Hungary and again Mikoyan tried to divert the discussion by raising other questions. Reuther hit out at Mikoyan's maneuver.

"This is an old Communist trick," he said. "We have seen it many times here and abroad. When you ask Communists about a problem or try to discuss an area which involves their sins and shortcomings, they always try to change the subject and to swing the talk around to the sins of capitalism."

Mikoyan then charged that the American trade union leaders were prejudiced. "You don't know the facts," he said, "why don't you come to Russia and see for yourselves?"

And while the interpreter was spelling this out, Mikoyan broke in again and observed sharply: "The American trade-union leaders are more antagonistic toward the Soviet Union than were the American capitalists whom I have met."

"You should know the reason for that," Reuther explained. "It is because the American trade-union leaders understand the Communists better than the American capitalists."

Abandoning this unfruitful tack, Mikoyan brought the talk back to Berlin. He proposed again that Berlin be made a "free city," with freedom of access for everyone—East and West—to Berlin, to be guaranteed by an international commission and with all sides removing their troops.

Reuther rejected this idea as unworkable. Geographically, he said, Berlin would be an island surrounded by Soviet-occupied territory. And he added, Berlin is not an economically viable unit. The problem of Berlin, he said, could not be worked out in a vacuum, but as part of a comprehensive consideration of the whole German question. The only adequate resolution of the question must rest on a genuinely free election, properly guaranteed by UN supervision, and participated in by all the people of East and West Germany. Let the German people decide, Reuther said.

Mikoyan leaped at this and pointed to the result of the last election held in East Germany, where the Communists won almost unanimously.

"No, no," Reuther said, "this is not the example of the kind of elections we suggest." Reuther declared that the Soviet Union continues to oppose a solution of the German problem based on a free and democratic vote because, in the recent free election in Berlin, the Communists received less than 3 percent of the vote.

Such an insignificant Communist vote clearly indicated, he said, that despite the fact that Berlin had a long history of a militant working class and political action, the people of Berlin emphatically reject the Communists. In the mind of the average German there is no essential difference between the totalitarianism of communism and Hitlerism.

At one stage, Mikoyan launched a bitter attack on Erich Ollenhauer for his leadership of the Social Democratic Party after World War II. This seemed to be an attempt to rewrite history by rearranging its dramatis personae. Reuther pointed out that Mikoyan was confusing historical facts: Kurt Schumacher was the Social Democratic leader at the time, not Ollenhauer. Being caught up and corrected made Mikoyan testy.

Reuther emphasized that the late Ernst Reuter, Mayor of Berlin, and Willy Brandt, his successor, were not men who would knuckle down to Communist control; they were men dedicated to a truly free Berlin.

Mikoyan stressed his belief that the first step toward reunification of Germany could be accomplished through confederation of East and West Germany and through closer cooperation between them. He saw precedents for such a move in the early history of both the United States and Russia. The American trade unionists saw little hope in such a formula, which they regarded as another devious Soviet maneuver.

In a final effort to prove his bona fides, Mikoyan said that under the Soviet plan Brandt would be permitted to remain mayor of West Berlin and there would be no change in Berlin's Government. Then the meeting broke up because Mikoyan was due to meet Vice President NIXON.

Absent from the meeting was AFL–CIO President George Meany, who told Carey he wouldn't care to break bread with Mikoyan. Two days after the labor session with Mikoyan, Meany denounced the Soviet leader as a double crosser of the Hungarian people.

He scored "those who feel we can meet the Soviet challenge at the conference table, and that the threat of human destruction, of total war, is enough assurance for our protection. I think this position is really a repudiation of our responsibility as trade unionists, one that all Americans must have."

The five trade union leaders who met with Mikoyan believe strongly in the value of the get-together. They consider it of major importance that Soviet Deputy Premier Mikoyan take back to his Kremlin colleague, Nikita Khrushchev, a first-hand account of American labor's opinions. It was important, they believe, for Mikoyan to know, not to guess, how American labor felt about communism.

Since Mikoyan's schedule included many meetings with top American business leaders, this conference with labor must have given what he could have gotten nowhere else—(1) a strong sense of American labor's distaste for Soviet policy and (2) a realization of American labor's competence and sophistication in handling the Soviet line, whether it is peddled through the hard sell or the soft.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I desire to associate myself with the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]. I am familiar with the article to which he has referred. I believe it to be a splendid one. It portrays the value of these programs for all people; and I commend the Senator from Kentucky for placing the article in the RECORD.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

IMPORTANCE OF STUDIES IN OCEANOGRAPHY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, for many years it has been my privilege to know Dr. Harrison Brown, of the California Institute of Technology. Dr. Brown is a dear and respected friend of mine, and is a scholar and scientist of very great breadth of vision.

About a year ago, Dr. Brown discussed with me for the first time the state of our Nation's knowledge of the oceans surrounding us, and the fact that the scientists of the Soviet Union were hard at work not only in rockets and missiles, but in oceanography—the study of the oceans and of the life within them.

I was powerfully reminded that we of the West—the Atlantic Community, the nations whose common physical bond is the Atlantic shoreline—have, in still another major lapse of attention, very nearly permitted ourselves to be left in the wake of another surge of Soviet scientific advance. I came to realize how pitifully inadequate was our knowledge of the seas which traditionally have been the lifelines of the Western world—over which far more than nine-tenths of all our men and material moved during World War II, and over which our forces flowed to Korea and to the later trouble spots of the world that required the presence of American armed forces.

I came to realize that the ocean deeps and the offshore shelves of the continents would ever increasingly become the arena in which the fateful decisions of war might very well be fought.

The intense concentration of the Soviet Union on submarine development and construction—to a degree surpassing by five times the prewar effort of Nazi Germany—began to be seen in its proper perspective. Soviet concentration in oceanography, Soviet effort on submarine building, Soviet progress in missile development, totaled a program of awesome dimensions for the offensive use of the ocean spaces.

Mr. President, let me add that the Soviet Union seeks to make the ocean its great base of operations—a base which covers three-fifths of the earth's surface.

It is apparently true that radioactive markers have recently been discovered off our coasts, and presumably they were planted by submarines for guidance in underwater navigation near our major east coast cities.

This development is just one more warning that if we persist in oversimplifying the Soviet threat, and if we insist on concentrating all our thinking and planning in one direction, we are going to go the way of France in 1940.

By now we should understand the folly of narrow, doctrinaire thinking and planning in the field of national security. The idea that communism could be contained by the threat of "massive retaliation" became an absurdity almost as soon as it was advanced. Yet how much of our present military budget is still a hangover from those days.

Until the day when the first sputnik went up, we persisted in happy ignorance, in believing that we held an unshakable deterrent in the form of our strategic air arm.

We are persisting yet in believing that because we possess a large family of tactical nuclear weapons, we have an effective deterrent against the employment of Communist ground forces. The "More Bang for a Buck" slogan coined by some Madison Avenue publicist for a political campaign still distorts and twists the thinking of those who hold the military purse strings in the administration. Yes, not even the Lebanon and the Formosa straits crises have produced any concrete demonstration that the top levels of the administration realize that the conventional forces are fast rebounding to center stage.

Today, too, we in the Congress are spending our energies in trying to force the administration to press forward with greater urgency in the missile development stage and in the race for the pioneering of space.

I support the effort to upgrade sharply our efforts in missiles and rockets and guidance systems. But I respectfully ask my colleagues: Are we, in our frustration, going to fall into the same mistake of putting all our eggs into one basket? Granted that there are very substantial military implications in the scientific effort to conquer space, and that there are important psychological ramifications, in terms of national prestige, yet, Mr. President, are not we, in our enthusiasm and zeal, leaving some tremendous gaps in our national armor? Are not we, in our preoccupation with the space above our heads, tending to forget the unknown depths beneath the keels of our warships and our merchant vessels? I believe that we are.

I also happen to believe that this Nation can afford to spend whatever amounts are necessary in order to defend our people and to provide a military shield for a constructive and effective foreign policy.

Among the two great gaps, then, in our national armor is the failure to maintain even a fraction of the modernized, mobile, but conventional forces needed to deter Communist conventional probings and attacks.

The second great gap is related both to the problem of dealing with conventional or limited war and to that of preserving a true deterrent against massive strategic attack on the United States. This is the gap caused by our ignorance of the secrets of the oceans, the marked failure of the antisubmarine science to keep up with the progress being made by the world's submariners, and the all-out construction program of the Soviet undersea force.

The Soviet submarine threat to the vital sea supply lanes of the Western World, coupled with the probability—as the Chief of Naval Operations indicated recently to my subcommittee—that the Soviet Union now has missile-carrying submarines, constitute reason enough for us to take serious alarm at the state of our sea defenses. This threat is reason enough, in itself, for us to be grateful for the monumental service which Dr. Harrison Brown and his distinguished colleagues on the Committee on Oceanography are rendering their Nation in focusing attention on the low state of the oceanographic art in the West, and in proposing hard, concrete, specific measures by which we can regain the loss initiative in this critically important field of knowledge.

But even beyond the military implications of the recommendations made last weekend in the committee's summary of recommendations, the committee has set forth other vital arguments which impel us to follow its recommendations.

A world in which man's numbers are increasing in geometric proportions, a world which—despite our own preoccupation with so-called food surpluses—can scarcely maintain a sufficient food supply to support life, can hardly afford to further overlook the teaming life of the oceans and their vast possibilities for increasing the world's supply of food.

The problem of the disposal of atomic wastes, the possibilities of gaining sufficient knowledge of the interaction of sea and land and air to give us a measure of climate control, these are also subjects of intense study by the Committee on Oceanography.

The Committee on Oceanography is, of course, a special committee of the National Committee of Sciences and the National Research Council. Its study, as I have indicated, was made public this past week.

Mr. President, this group of scientists has undertaken a unique and historic effort. Its members have devoted countless and ill-spared hours and days out of busy and productive professional lives to confer upon and agree upon a comprehensive recommendation to our people—a recommendation for national action that demands detailed and immediate attention of the Congress.

The proposal is modest in terms of cost. In fact, I was surprised, on reading the recommendations last week, that the costs of the shipbuilding programs proposed and the increase in staffing suggested were not far higher than the figure proposed in the committee's recommendations.

Briefly, the committee proposes a total national investment of approximately $650 million spread over the next 10 years—about one-third of which would go to build a modern fleet of 70 oceanographic research vessels—for both basic and applied oceanographic research. This is, it should be emphasized, a minimal figure which will support an effort barely sufficient to stay even with the Soviet growth in useful knowledge of the oceans.

We should be bolder in our investment.

The committee, after much serious discussion, has decided to recommend that there not be a new major oceanographic research agency—and I repeat the word "not"—but rather that the program proceed through the expansion of existing programs in the Federal agencies and the great educational and scientific institutions of the Nation.

This decision throws a special burden on the Congress to examine not one budget, but the several budgets of the agencies involved—such as the Navy, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Bureau of Fisheries, and the National Science Foundation—and to try to make an evaluation as to whether or not the administration is preparing a properly balanced and sufficient new program in oceanography.

I hope that the Committee on Oceanography will continued to sit, and will accept a new role as adviser and consultant to the several subcommittees of Congress which will have the major responsibility for evaluating, judging, and voting upon the present and future appropriation requests in the field of oceanography.

Mr. President, I wish to publicly commend the Committee on Oceanography for the splendid beginning it has made, and for the timely issue of chapter 1 of its monumental 12-chapter report.

Mr. President, while I recognize that this report is of some length, it is the first report we have had since 1949 on the subject of oceanography—the study of the ocean floor and the ocean itself. The first committee was established in 1927, under the chairmanship of Dr. Frank R. Lillie. The second one, of which Dr. Detlev Bronk was chairman, was, as I have said, established in 1949. Therefore, since no report has been made available to the executive branch of the Government of the United States, or to the Congress, since 1949, and since these recommendations will be presented to the Congress by the President or his appropriate officer, such as the Secretary of Defense or others, I believe that the report should be incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that there be printed, at the conclusion of my remarks, excerpts from chapter 1 of the report of the Committee on Oceanography of the National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council, entitled "Oceanography, 1960 to 1970." This particular report, Mr. President, should rank in the same classification with the Rockefeller report and the Gaither report, when it comes to the outlining of some of the means of adequately protecting our national security.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAPTER 1. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON OCEANOGRAPHY, NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES-NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

(By Harrison Brown, California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, Calif.)

I. INTRODUCTION

Two-thirds of the earth's surface is covered by the waters of the seas. The waters themselves greatly affect our lives—they play a major role in governing our climate; they provide inexpensive transportation; from them we derive important quantities of nourishment; they have traditionally provided protection against military attack. Beneath the surface a myriad of wonders is concealed. There are trenches, the floors of which are as much as 7 miles below sea level. Mountains which approach Mount Everest in height rise up from the ocean floor. Sediments in the ocean deeps contain detailed records of earth history—and, associated with it, life history. The more than 300 million cubic miles of water contain huge assemblages of living matter of fantastic variety.

As our technological civilization increases in complexity, as human populations grow more and more rapidly, as problems of military defense become increasingly difficult, as man pushes forward with his relentless quest for greater understanding of himself, his origins and the universe in which we live—as all of these changes take place, detailed knowledge and understanding of the oceans and their contents will assume ever greater importance.

Man's knowledge of the oceans is meager indeed when compared with their importance to him. Recognizing that neglect in this area of endeavor might well result in our being placed in a precarious position from the scientific, technological, and military points of view, the National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council decided in 1957 to form a Committee on Oceanography. In May of that year, President Detlev Bronk appointed Harrison Brown, professor of geochemistry at the California Institute of Technology, chairman of the committee. The committee itself was formed during the following months and its first meeting was held in November 1957.

The members of the committee are: Harrison Brown (chairman), California Institute of Technology, Pasadena, Calif.; Maurice Ewing, Lamont Geological Observatory, Columbia University, Palisades, N.Y.; Columbus O'D. Iselin, Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution, Woods Hole, Mass.; Fritz Koczy, Marine Laboratory of the University of Miami, Miami, Fla.; Sumner Pike, Lubec, Maine, formerly Commissioner, U.S. Atomic Energy Commission; Colin Pittendrigh, Department of Biology, Princeton University, Princeton, N.J.; Roger Revelle, Scripps Institution of Oceanography, La Jolla, Calif.; Gordon Riley, Bingham Oceanographic Laboratory, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.; Milner B. Schaefer, Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission, La Jolla, Calif.; Athelstan Spilhaus, Institute of Technology, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Minn.; and Richard Vetter (executive secretary), formerly with the Geophysics Branch of the Office of Naval Research, Washington, D.C.

The work of the committee was made possible by the sponsorship of several Government agencies, all of which have interests in the oceans: Atomic Energy Commission, Bureau of Commercial Fisheries, National Science Foundation, Office of Naval Research.

The committee was organized as a part of the division of earth sciences of the National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council.

At the request of President Bronk, the committee has made a survey of the present status of the marine sciences in the United States. It has attempted further to assess the major problems of operations, administration, and funding in this area and to evaluate the probable needs for oceanographic knowledge in the years ahead. On the basis of its findings, the committee has drawn up a series of recommendations which, if followed, can result in a strengthening of the marine sciences during the next 10 years to a level which is consistent on the one hand with the assessed needs, and on the other with limitations such as the rates at which ships and laboratories can be built and new oceanographers can be trained. It should be stressed, however, that the committee considers its recommendations minimal ones. Action on a scale appreciably less than that recommended will jeopardize the position of oceanography in the United States relative to the position of the science in other major nations, thereby accentuating serious military and political dangers, and placing the Nation at a disadvantage in the future use of the resources of the sea.

The deliberations of the committee[1] were complicated by a number of factors: oceanography embraces many sciences—indeed "oceanography" encompasses the scientific study of all aspects of the oceans, their boundaries, and their contents; research is undertaken in a variety of private and Government laboratories; numerous Government agencies have direct but differing interests in the oceans; funds are derived from many sources. In order to expedite the formulation of recommendations under these circumstances, several specialized panels were formed for the purpose of making specific studies: oceanographic research ships, new devices for exploring the oceans, ocean resources, radioactivity in the oceans, international cooperation in the marine sciences.

The memberships of the panels are listed at the end of this summary. The Committee on Oceanography is greatly indebted to the panel members, who gave extensively of their time to these studies, and without whose help the recommendations could not have been formulated.

The complete reports of the panels have been incorporated into the final report of the Committee. Chapter headings of the final report are listed inside the front cover of this summary. Individual chapters will be made available separately through the National Academy of Sciences as soon as possible. In addition, a condensed version of the Committee's report shortly will be made available for widespread distribution. The reader is referred to individual chapters of the report for more detailed discussion of the background, facts and reasoning which have led to the recommendations summarized in section III, general recommendations.

II. THE IMPORTANCE OF THE PROBLEM

The Committee has found that relative to other areas of scientific endeavor, progress in the marine sciences in the United States has been slow. There has been a substantial amount of excellent work, more often than not undertaken under extremely difficult and trying circumstances. But generally speaking progress has not been rapid when compared with the essential and exciting information yet to be obtained by probing the vast and dark, but penetrable, depths of water which cover so much of the earth's surface.

The seas present a challenge to man which in magnitude approaches that of space. At least we have been able to observe the moon, planets and stars directly with our telescopes. But the ocean depths, shrouded in darkness, have been obscured from our view. We know less about many regions of the oceans today than we know about the lunar surface.

From the purely scientific point of view, the study of the oceans' depths can be fully as rewarding as the study of the moon. Records of ancient earth history are locked in deep-sea sediments. Intensive study of the seas can teach us a great deal about the origin and evolution of our planet and the life upon it.

On the practical side the problems to be solved concerning the oceans are clearly more urgent than those of space. The problem of providing food, particularly animal protein, for the growing numbers of underfed people in the world is becoming increasingly acute. Given more study man can economically harvest a great deal more food from the seas than is now possible. Considering the position of the United States in the community of nations it seems appropriate, even essential, that we lead the way in this respect.

From the point of view of military operations there is no comparison between the urgencies of the problems of the oceans and those of outer space. The submarine armed with long range missiles is probably the most potent weapon system threatening our security today. It seems clear that the pressures of establishing effective bases, and of protecting ourselves from attack, are relentlessly driving us into the oceans.

The problems involved in military operations in the sea are enormous. We will not be able to navigate under the oceans with adequate precision until our knowledge is greatly expanded. Nor will we be able to detect submerged submarines efficiently unless we learn far more about the ocean depths than we now know. We will not be in a position to negotiate an adequate international submarine control and monitoring system until we have the ability to make the oceans transparent so that we can track all submarines in the oceans, both our own and all others. To accomplish this, we must place greater national emphasis on research in the marine geophysical sciences, on surveys of the ocean background against which tracking must be accomplished, and on the development of effective devices to achieve such oceanwide surveillance. The committee's recommendations constitute an essential first step in these directions.

With these problems and prospects in mind, this committee has attempted to assess the steps which should be taken in order that the United States might possess outstanding capabilities in the oceanographic field, and in order that we might obtain sufficient knowledge in time to avert a "crash" program—which would be wasteful in terms both of money and valuable technical manpower.

The cornerstone of our oceanographic endeavors is basic research. We need to understand waves and the interactions between the atmosphere and the oceans. We need to know more about ocean currents and upwellings. More intensive studies should be made of the properties of sea water and of processes of sedimentation. We should systematically study the life forms in the oceans in three dimensions. We should study the sea floor with instruments and we should send men down to look at it in many localities.

In view of the complexities of these problems, the committee has recommended that the level of basic research in these fundamental areas be substantially increased during the next 10 years. This will require increases both in manpower and in facilities. Of particular importance among the facilities are ships, which are to the oceanographer what cyclotrons or reactors are to the nuclear physicist. He simply cannot undertake adequate research without them.

[1] The committee as a whole acted as a panel on basic research, on education and manpower, and on problems of operations, sponsorship, and funding.

Our oceanographic research ships are inadequate for the job which must be done. Most of the ships are old and outdated. Many are obsolete and should be replaced by ships of modern design which will be more efficient to operate and from which a greater variety of scientific observations can be made. In addition, the number should be increased.

The oceanographer also needs improved instruments if he is to penetrate the water barrier and learn in detail about conditions at great depths. Thus far oceanographers have not been able to take full advantage of recent technological developments and, accordingly, the committee has recommended the establishment of a program of broad scope, aimed at developing and using new instruments and devices for exploring the sea. Using new deep-diving vehicles, for example, it is now possible for man to observe directly the ocean deeps. It seems highly likely that within the next 10 years men will descend through the water nearly 7 miles to the deepest point on earth.

An integral aspect of a program for learning about the oceans involves our surveying them more or less routinely. The topography of the ocean floor should be mapped in detail. We should arrive at a complete picture of gravitational and magnetic forces and of ocean currents in three dimensions. Sufficient biological information should be gathered so that we can prepare accurate maps of the distribution of life in the sea.

All of these studies, together with others like them, will have bearing upon the more immediate practical problems which confront us in the military area and in the area of ocean resource development. In addition to this, however, it is clear that the applied research and development programs in these areas should be expanded.

In the committee's attempts to give quantitative indications of the relative amount of effort which it believes should be placed upon various aspects of the proposed program by individual Government agencies, suggested budgets have been compiled for a 10-year period. These suggested budgets, in the committee's opinion, present a reasonable representation of the magnitude and kind of effort and the degree of interagency cooperation which will be required if the recommended goals are to be achieved. In addition, a budget permits a direct comparison of efforts in this field relative to the efforts in other fields of scientific and technological endeavor.

III. GENERAL RECOMMENDATIONS

The key to the growth of oceanography in the United States lies in basic research—research which is done for its own sake without thought of specific practical applications. The very nature of basic research is such that the problems which will be attacked and the results which will be obtained cannot be predicted. The very nature of applied research is such that its success depends upon the size of the reservoir of fundamental knowledge upon which it must draw. The rate of progress in the applied marine sciences will be determined in the long run by the rate of progress in the basic marine sciences.

The committee has concluded that both the quantity and quality of basic research in the marine sciences can and should be increased substantially during the years ahead. Specifically the committee recommends:

1. The U.S. Government should expand its support of the marine sciences at a rate which will result in at least a doubling of basic research activity during the next 10 years.[2]

It should be emphasized that doubling the basic research activity will require more than doubling the total expenditures.

A large part of the deliberations of the committee were devoted to discussions of the conditions under which basic research can flourish. First and foremost, progress depends upon the interests, experience, and creative imaginations of individual scientists. But the individual scientist does not work in a vacuum. He must have instruments and facilities. He must live in an atmosphere which is conducive to creative activity. These necessities in turn give rise to problems involving marine research laboratories—problems of leadership, financial stability, flexibility, growth, academic associations, and physical facilities.

Not only for research but in order to exploit and use the oceans we need more detailed knowledge which can only be obtained through systematic surveys in three dimensions. These surveys should include such features as depth, salinity, temperature, current velocity, wave motion, magnetism, and biological activity. It is essential that these surveys be conducted on an oceanwide ocean-deep basis as quickly as possible. Our knowledge is now largely limited to waters 100 miles from shore, and even here it is inadequate for present and future needs. Accordingly, the committee recommends:

2. The increase in support of basic research should be accompanied during the next ten years by a new program of oceanwide surveys. This will require a twofold expansion of the present surveying effort.

We believe that, on a long-range basis, basic research coupled with systematic ocean surveys are of paramount importance in solving a number of urgent practical problems involving military defense, the development of ocean resources and possible future increases of radioactive contamination of the seas resulting from the rapid development of atomic energy. However, research and surveys must go hand in hand with a vigorous and imaginative applied research and development program. Accordingly, the committee recommends:

3. The United States should expand considerably its support of the applied marine sciences, particularly in the areas of military defense, marine resources and marine radioactivity.

The implementation of these general recommendations requires action upon a number of broad fronts. More marine scientists must be educated. Additional ships and shore facilities must be built. New instruments and techniques must be developed. International cooperation in the marine sciences must be strengthened.

To achieve these aims in the next 10 years will necessitate many agencies of the Federal Government working together both in planning and in providing the moneys.[3] Taking into account the relative degrees of interest and importance of oceanography to individual agencies, the committee recommends:

4. The Navy and the National Science Foundation should each finance about 50 percent of the new basic research activity except ship construction. The Navy should finance 50 percent of the new research ship construction with the Maritime Administration and the National Science Foundation sharing the remainder. The Navy, through the Hydrographic Office, should finance 50 percent of the deep ocean surveys, while the Coast and Geodetic Survey should finance the balance. The Navy should sponsor completely all military research and development operations. The Bureau of Commercial Fisheries should finance the greater part of the recommended ocean resources program. The Atomic Energy Commission should finance the major part of the research dealing with the problems of radioactive contamination of the oceans. The National Science Foundation and the Office of Education should sponsor jointly the proposed program for increasing scientific and technical manpower in the marine sciences. Efforts aimed at fostering international cooperation in the marine sciences should be sponsored by the Department of State, the International Cooperation Administration and the National Science Foundation. Other agencies should take responsibility for certain aspects of the proposed program, particularly the Public Health Service, the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines.

Although the bulk of oceanographic research and survey work must of necessity be financed by the Federal Government the value of State and private funds cannot be overestimated. Such funds are especially helpful for supporting initial exploratory basic research and for starting new laboratories. Accordingly, the committee recommends:

5. Private foundations and universities, industry, and State governments should all take an active part in the recommended program of expansion.

IV. SPECIFIC RECOMMENDATIONS

Education and manpower

1. The universities now providing graduate education for oceanographers should be encouraged to increase the numbers and quality of their output. Some institutions which now teach oceanographers in only certain branches of oceanography should add professors in other fields to their faculties. These measures will require financial support.

2. Institutions which undertake considerable research, but provide no regular formal teaching in oceanography, could contribute greatly to the education of oceanographers at the highest level by close formal affiliations with universities. Conversely, universities should recognize their responsibilities in the education of oceanographers. They should welcome this affiliation with marine laboratories and arrange for the interchange of faculties. This will require financial support.

3. It may be desirable to develop oceanographic education at new centers. However, a critical mass of faculty in the basic sciences is essential for successful teaching of oceanographers. Such new centers should, therefore, be developed at universities which possess strong faculties in the sciences.

4. In order to finance new faculty in oceanography at existing or new teaching centers, the U.S. Government should provide funds on long-term commitments. This Committee recommends that about $500,000 per year be appropriated for salaries and the equipment and indirect costs associated with such positions. This program could be operated through the Office of Education.

5. In order to attract competent graduate students to the long and somewhat arduous schooling required of well-qualified oceanographers, it will be necessary to provide substantial long-term fellowships. It is believed that 80 fellowships should be supported on a 5-year basis and at an average stipend of $3,500 to $4,000 per student each year. This will produce 12–15 new Ph. D.'s per year (allowing a reasonable attrition factor) at an annual cost of about $300,000. This would provide approximately one-third of the student support that will be needed in order to double the number of oceanographers at the Ph. D. level during the next 10 years.

[2] In 1958 about $23 million were spent by applied and basic oceanographic research. The basic research share of the total was not over $9 million. About $8 million of this, including the 1958 share of IGY expenditures, was Federal funds.

[3] One method suggested for developing more effective interagency cooperation is through the proposed Federal Council for Science and Technology. This Council is described in "Strengthening American Science," a recent report of the President's Science Advisory Committee.

It is desirable that fellowships permit students to attend more than one university. This can provide students with well-rounded educations in all branches of oceanography without each university having to provide a full curriculum. Such a program should be handled through the National Science Foundation.

6. Efforts should be made in research and survey programs to use larger numbers of assistants at the bachelor and master's level in order to utilize more efficiently the limited number of persons available at the doctoral level.

7. Oceanographers should undertake more active recruiting of prospective oceanographers among undergraduate students of physics, chemistry, biology, and geology.

New ships for research, development, and surveying

1. A shipbuilding program should be started aimed at replacing, modernizing, and enlarging the number of oceangoing ships now being used for research, surveying, and development. Specifically in the period 1960–70 the research, development and survey fleet should be increased from its present size of about 45 ships to 85 ships. Taking into account the replacement of ships which must be retired during the next decade, this means that 70 ships should be constructed at a total estimated cost of $213 million.

2. The size ranges recommended for new oceangoing ships are: About 500 tons, 1,200 tons, and 2,200 tons displacement.

3. The conversion of vessels, which were originally designed for other purposes, into research, development, or survey vessels is to be discouraged. Such conversions are generally uneconomical.

4. The recommendations for the construction of ships for specific purposes (basic research, military research and development, oceanic surveys, resources and fisheries) are given in table 1.

5. The recommended size distribution for new ships is given in table 2.

6. The Navy should provide about 50 percent of the financing for the construction of new ships for basic research, all of the financing for new ships for military research and development, and 50 percent of the financing for new ships for oceanic surveys. The Coast and Geodetic Survey should provide 50 percent of the financing for the construction of new ships for oceanic surveys. The Bureau of Commercial Fisheries should finance the construction of all of the new ships for marine biological resources and fisheries studies. The National Science Foundation and the Maritime Administration should each provide about 25 percent of the financing for new ships for basic research. The numbers of ships in each size category which should be built by each of the sponsoring agencies are given in table 3.

7. Detailed recommendations for the scheduling of ship construction by each of the sponsoring agencies are given in table 4. Estimated capital costs by year and by agency are given in table 5, based upon the assumption that a 500-ton ship will cost about $1.65 million, a 1,200–1,500-ton ship will cost about $3.80 million, and a 2,000-ton ship will cost about $5 million.

8. The Maritime Administration should be consulted in the designing of all ships paid for from public funds and used for marine studies.

9. Research ships operated by private institutions like those operated by the Navy, Coast Guard, and Coast and Geodetic Survey should be exempt from those existing legal requirements for living accommodations, safety, and the licensing of crews, which are practical and sensible only on large (3,000 tons) merchant ships.

10. All noncombatant surface ships used for research, development, or surveying should be operated by the laboratory or agency directly concerned and should have civilian crews.

11. In most cases the annual costs of operating vessels for basic research by non-Government laboratories should be paid for separately from the other expenses of research, for example, through a long-term facilities contract distinct from any research contracts.

[1] Excluding military research and development ship operations.

12. The costs of ship operations paid by the Federal Government should be subdivided as follows: The Navy should pay for 50 percent of the operational costs of ships used for basic research, all of the operational costs of ships used in military research and development, and 50 percent of the operational costs of ships used for oceanic surveys.

The Coast and Geodetic Survey should pay for 50 percent of the operational costs of ships used for surveys. The Bureau of Commercial Fisheries should pay for the operations of ships used for resources and fisheries studies. The National Science Foundation should pay for 50 percent of the operational costs of ships used for basic research.

13. Estimated costs of ship operations, both by function and by agency, are given in tables 6 and 7.

Shore facilities for basic research

In order to derive the maximum knowledge from observations and collections made at sea, it is estimated that 60 technical persons must be available for the average ship involved in high seas research activity. Most of these persons are involved in land-based activities which require laboratories and associated facilities.

1. It is recommended that for every additional oceangoing research ship put into operation, an average investment of $1.5 million be made for essential shore facilities. These costs should be divided between the Navy and the National Science Foundation.

2. It is estimated that the costs of research other than ship operations will average about $1.2 million per ship per year. The committee recommends that Federal funds for this purpose be divided between the Navy and the National Science Foundation.

The costs to each agency, by year, are given in table 8. Capital allocations are assigned to the year preceding the placing of a new research ship into operation. Although table 8 shows no increase in the operating costs of shore-based facilities for basic research until 1961 when the first new ships are completed, we expect that plans now being made by various Federal agencies (mainly the National Science Foundation and the Navy) involving budgets for basic oceanographic research will be able to maintain the 1958 level of activity and allow for some buildup of staffs. Such plans should be strongly supported by the agencies, the Bureau of the Budget and the Congress in order to avoid a serious relapse of our present capabilities.

Oceanwide surveys

The capital and operating costs for ships involved in surveys of the world oceans have been given in a previous section. However, it is estimated that substantial shore facilities are required for the purpose of evaluating the data collected at sea. It is estimated that capital costs for shore facilities for each new survey ship will average about $750,000. It is further estimated that operating costs for shore facilities will amount to about $750,000 per survey ship per year.

1. The committee recommends that for every new survey ship put into operation an investment of about $750,000 be made for essential shore facilities.

2. It is recommended that an average of $750,000 be allocated each year for the operation of shore facilities for each new survey ship placed in operation.

These costs should be divided between the Navy and the Coast and Geodetic Survey. The costs to each agency, by year, are given in table 9. Capital allocations are assigned to the year preceding the placing of a new survey ship into operation.

3. Consideration should be given to conducting some aspects of the survey program through contracts with commercial organizations and private institutions.

Engineering needs for ocean exploration

1. A vigorous program should be conducted for the development of manned submersibles that can operate down to and on the bottom of most of the ocean:

(a) An improved bathyscaphe using the best materials and techniques available should be designed and built immediately.

(b) Following up the recent commendable ONR action in bringing the bathyscaphe Trieste to the United States, it is recommended that funds be made available for a mother ship [4] together with auxiliary equipment in order to make maximum use of this deep submersible.

(c) A continuous design and development program should be initiated aimed at building deep and mid-depth manned vehicles as the need arises and as the state of the art progresses.

2. The need for open-ocean manned research platforms which are stable, and which can remain in place so that time studies can be made, seems essential and the design for such a buoy should be started.

3. A major program should be supported aimed at developing and using anchored and drifting buoys for obtaining space and time coverage of ocean characteristics.

4. It seems likely that aircraft can be used effectively for some research and surveys on the open ocean, particularly for studies involving the joint problems of oceanography and meteorology. Nearly all laboratories will need single-engine planes; several will need twin-engined amphibious planes; some will need four-engined commercial-type aircraft.

5. Surface icebreakers are of little value to oceanography. Efforts should be made to develop a submarine capable of breaking into and out of the ice.

6. Instruments should be developed for survey purposes which are more accurate, effective and troublefree than those now in use. The techniques needed to use them more effectively should be developed. Specialized devices such as Loran C, inertial navigation equipment, gravity meters and stable platforms should be made available for research as well as surveys as soon as possible.

7. A major program aimed at developing new high-seas engineering techniques should be started. Our abilities to handle heavy equipment and to conduct such operations as drilling and bottom sampling at sea limit our operations at present. Many of these difficulties would be appreciably lessened given proper effect. We have not included the very important problem of drilling to the Mohorovicic Discontinuity in our budget because another academy group is studying this problem.

8. Machine aids to computation and data storage have much to offer and should be budgeted.

9. High pressure facilities to permit controlled physical and biological experiments in the laboratory are needed.

10. Efforts should be made to secure the active participation of private industry in the development and manufacture of new devices and instruments for oceanographic research and surveying.

11. The unpredictable aspects of new devices makes difficult the formulation of an exact budget over a 10-year time scale. The committee recommends that $48 million be allocated during the next 5 years. It further recommends that a minimum of $10.5 million be allocated each year thereafter. The cost of this program should be divided between the Bureaus of the Navy and the National Science Foundation.

Budget breakdowns are given in tables 10 and 11.

Radioactivity in the oceans

The widespread use of nuclear energy for peaceful or military purposes necessitates studies to determine the effects of radioactive contamination upon the oceans and the life therein. The Committee on Effects of Atomic Radiation on Oceanography and

[4] This is listed in the section on "New Ships."

Fisheries in its report to the National Academy of Sciences made certain general recommendations concerning national policy in this area. Both the Committee on Oceanography and the Committee on Effects of Atomic Radiation on Oceanography and Fisheries believe that more specific and detailed recommendations can now be made.

1. A single agency should be given the overall responsibility and authority for regulating the introduction of radioactive materials in the oceans. Monitoring of disposal sites should be done by some agency other than the regulating agency. It is recommended that either the Coast and Geodetic Survey or the Public Health Service be made responsible for engineering studies in and near disposal areas, for routine monitoring of disposal areas and their surroundings and for a continuing assessment of the effects on the environments of added radioactive materials.

2. Vigorous programs should be started for the purpose of determining the circulation and mixing processes which control the dispersion of introduced contaminants in coastal and estuarine environments and in the open ocean. These studies represent the major part of the proposed budget in this area.

3. A program should be pursued aimed at determining the inorganic transfer of radioactive elements from sea water to the sediments.

4. Studies should be made of the effects of living organisms on the distribution of radioactive elements introduced into the sea.

5. The genetic effects of radiation upon marine organisms should be studied.

6. A variety of biological field experiments should be conducted utilizing radioisotopes.

7. The proposed budgets for the programs are given in tables 12 and 13. The greater part of the program should be financed by the Atomic Energy Commission.

Ocean resources

Lack of adequate understanding of the occurrence, behavior and potential harvest of fish and other marine organisms serves as a serious barrier to extensive economic development and utilization of marine biological resources. Existing knowledge is inadequate to evaluate the feasibility of creating a marine mineral industry.

1. The sea and its contents should be studied on a broad basis to enlarge our knowledge of its potential resources.

2. In order to elucidate the problem of population fluctuations of commercial fish stocks, which in large part is due to variable infant mortality, laboratory studies of the survival requirements of larval and juvenile stages of commercially important fish and shellfish are needed urgently.

3. There is an urgent need for facilities for studies of fish behavior in the laboratory under controlled conditions. This will require aquarium facilities of sizable physical dimensions.

4. Greater attention should be given to studies of the genetics of fish and other marine organisms.

5. Investigations should be made of the feasibility of adding nutrients to the euphotic zone of the sea in order to increase the productivity of marine organisms.

6. A program to investigate the possibilities of transplanting useful organisms from one region of the sea to another should be conducted.

7. More research is needed on the nature of the aggregations of organisms in the sea.

8. Biological surveys in the seas should be intensified, and programs should be initiated aimed at utilizing new devices such as unmanned buoys and the mesoscaph.

9. A data center for all oceanographic research should be established for the storage, routine processing and read-out of such information as sea surface temperatures, currents and meteorological data. This data center would not perform the functions of more specialized computing centers such as will be required for oceanographic forecasting.

10. There is a need for scientific, sociological and engineering studies directed toward the wider utilization of marine products in protein-deficient areas of the world.

11. There is a pressing need for studies of the economic and legal aspects of commercial fisheries, especially in comparison with other industries, in order to provide a basis for national policy decisions.

12. A scientific study of salt water fishpond culture should be started aimed at providing a basis for greatly increasing the efficiency and productivity of this industry and thereby increasing the protein food supplies in protein-deficient areas such as southeast Asia.

13. Many aspects of the potential mineral resources on the deep sea floor should be investigated. Such work should be supported through the Bureau of Mines.

14. An expanded program of estuarine research is recommended in order that we can make most effective use of this habitat of important resident stocks of food fish and shellfish and the nursery areas for other stocks which are later harvested from the open ocean.

15. Many lines of marine research depend upon precise definition of species. The study of species is centered in research museums which generally have been supported very poorly. It is recommended that established museums having significant study collections be given financial support so that this kind of work can be carried forward.

16. It is recommended that a program on diseases and other toxic effects in the marine environment be established.

The proposed budgets for these recommendations are given in tables 14, 15, and 16. The mineral resources investigation should be sponsored by the Bureau of Mines with the balance being supported by the Bureau of Commercial Fisheries through grants, contracts and in its own laboratories and with the assistance of other branches of the Department of the Interior. Programs involving international cooperation and technical assistance to other countries budgeted under this heading should be supported at least in part by the International Cooperation Administration and the State Department.

Budget and operations

The total recommended budget for the period 1960–70 broken down by category and agency is given in tables 17 and 18. It should be emphasized that although the budget includes the capital costs of ships involved in strictly military research and development, it does not include the other costs which are involved in such work.

Concerning the actual funding and operations, the committee recommends:

1. A higher percentage of longer term funding must be made available in oceanographic research. Past funding has been inefficient, and has held back much longer term imaginative research. A reasonable portion (30 to 50 percent) of the annual operating budget should include 5 year money which is refreshed annually. Existing laws permit allocation of many funds on a 5 year basis. The military is accustomed to making long term commitments of 5–10 years when they adopt a new weapons system and it is equally essential that they make long term commitments for research.

2. Administrators of research and laboratory directors must have a higher percentage (25 to 50 percent) of their funding free to spend on those good research problems which emerge without the benefit of planning.

3. Government organizations which presently fund or carry on extensive research and development in oceanography should continue to do so in the field of their special interests. For example, the Navy, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the Bureau of Commercial Fisheries all have their own important oceanographic problems. It is recommended that each bureau and organization sponsor and finance much of the research which it needs to meet the demands of its present and future objectives. Any duplication of effort which might be involved appears trivial compared to the value of insuring that scientists are in close touch with changing bureau problems.

4. There will still remain a need for a great deal of research which should be funded by the National Science Foundation. This agency should carry a much heavier portion of the long term basic research in the Nation. A reasonable percentage of grants should be made to individuals and a reasonable portion should be allocated for long term funding of institutional activities such as vehicles, facilities and major expeditions.

5. Foundations, States and industries should take an active part in the support of marine research. Their support is particularly valuable in new and unusual research programs, in filling technological gaps and through appropriate assistance insuring that private laboratories and academic groups do not become solely dependent on Federal assistance.

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION

It is clear that, as in other sciences, a very large part of the pioneering research and new ideas concerning the oceans must come from individual scientists or small groups working independently. But international cooperation in work at sea is essential in several kinds of marine research and should also greatly facilitate surveys of the ocean floor and of the waters.

There is at present a high level of international cooperation among physical and chemical oceanographers of different countries resulting from the International Geophysical Year. This cooperation should be maintained and broadened throughout all aspects of the marine sciences, particularly including biology. To this end, the Committee recommends:

1. The United States through the National Science Foundation should give its proportionate share (amounting to perhaps $20,000 per year) of financial and other support to the Special Committee on Oceanic Research of the International Council of Scientific Unions. The Committee on Oceanography has been designated as the U.S. national committee for this long-range cooperative program.

2. Grants should also be sought from foundations and governmental sources to support special projects such as the proposed year-long international expedition to the Indian Ocean by covering the increased expenses to U.S. oceanographic institutions and by making the participation of other countries possible. Special funds needed for the Indian Ocean project are estimated at about $2 million.

3. An intergovernmental conference of the maritime countries should be called, after suitable preparation, to discuss means by which the governments can cooperate in increasing man's knowledge of the oceans. Specifically, agreements should be sought regarding the means of carrying out ocean-wide surveys, including allocation of responsibility to different countries, intercalibration of techniques, and free exchange of data. It would be expected that the U.S proportion of this international responsibility for surveys would be about the same as its proportion of financial responsibility for support of United Nations agencies. This conference should be a first step toward the establishment of a World Oceanographic Organization; a United Nations specialized agency corresponding to the World Meteorological Organization.

4. In the study and conservation of the living resources of the sea, regional international organizations, such as the various international fisheries commissions, have proven effective.

In developing formal intergovernmental cooperation in the marine sciences, the Federal Government should give special emphasis to the establishment and adequate support of such regional organizations, and should seek to broaden their charter to allow an integrated research program on all aspects of a particular oceanic region.

5. In order to increase the effectiveness of cooperation between U.S. marine scientists and laboratories and marine scientists in other countries, the U.S. State Department should be prepared to assist positively, sympathetically and promptly in facilitating research ship operations and the exchange of information, persons, equipment, and supplies.

6. The need for increased protein foods from the sea is especially urgent in underdeveloped countries. The International Cooperation Administration in its programs of technical assistance should give greater emphasis to marine resources surveys and to research projects and training programs in the marine sciences. The Federal Government should also encourage United Nations specialized agencies such as UNESCO and FAO in their efforts to aid underdeveloped countries to achieve greater utilization of marine resources. The funds needed for both these purposes have not been budgeted separately in this report but are included in the budget for ocean resources studies.

RETURN OF POLITICAL REFUGEES TO CUBA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on January 23, the Eugene Register-Guard, a newspaper published in Eugene, Oreg., published an editorial entitled "Castro Wants the 'Traitors' Sent Home." The word "traitors" is in quotation marks.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial in full be published at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CASTRO WANTS THE "TRAITORS" SENT HOME

Cuba's Fidel Castro, who may be excused for feeling his oats, talks tough. He demands that the United States return to Cuba some "traitors" whom Castro wants punished. It is unlikely that he will get them back—at least not with any help from the U.S. Government. For the Cubans who have fled to this country have come here seeking the historic privilege of asylum that the United States has offered political refugees since the early days of the Republic.

Castro is not the first to fulminate against this country's annoying habit of sheltering those who are out of favor at home. Napoleon, the czars, the Bolsheviks, Hitler, Franco, and a hatful of Latin American strong men have come before him, all demanding that such and such a "traitor" be packed home to face the music.

In some respects, America was built by refugees, beginning with the Pilgrims who could not square their beliefs with the Anglo-Catholic Stuart kings of England. The founding father who did not land on these shores with a price on his head was an undistinguished arrival. As revolution grew more commonplace, so did the refugees who fled to America.

The high point probably came in the middle of the last century, after the revolutions in Spain, Italy, Greece, Poland, France (twice), and Germany. Among the distinguished refugees who sought freedom in America were Carl Schurz, Charles Steinmetz, and the parents of Justice Brandeis. King Louis Philippe, who haunted London for a time after the revolution of 1848, went to Boston where he gave French lessons in an apartment above an oyster bar.

In more recent times, America has sheltered refugees from Bolshevism, becoming the promised land for thousands of White Russians. Later, as Hitler drove out those who did not agree with him, America became the home of Albert Einstein, Thomas Mann, and many more. Likewise, in our time Spanish Republicans took refuge in this country. And, don't forget, the Hungarian freedom fighters.

After the abortive revolution in Austria-Hungary in 1848, the Government there demanded that this country return to Europe one of the leaders of the revolutionary movement. To this Secretary of State William L. Marcy replied, "To return political offenders * * * is not a duty, but, on the contrary, would be considered a dishonorable subserviency to a foreign power, and an act meriting the reprobation of mankind."

Ah, but we hear, Castro is not Hitler. Castro is a liberator who drove out a dictator. The men whose heads Castro wants are not nice men. They are butchers who should be returned to Cuba to get their just deserts. We cannot put these Cuban thugs in the same class with honorable patriots who had to flee their homelands for political reasons. They are not at all like the Hungarian freedom fighters.

To argue in such a manner calls for making value judgments. And that we must not do. We dare not say that, because the evidence today shows that one politician deserves to be on the lam and that another is a brave champion of freedom, we should return the one man and shelter the next. Tomorrow we might be proved wrong.

Castro has been busy lately and has had little time for reading. But we suggest that, as time permits, he read good biography, specializing in the biographies of men who have come to power in unstable governmental situations. There is a saying about men in Castro's position and it goes approximately like this:

The first year he's a liberator. The third year he's a politician. By the fifth year he's a dictator and after that he's a poor life insurance risk.

It wasn't too many years ago that Batista was regarded as a liberator.

The day may well come when Castro himself is thankful that the United States extends the privilege of asylum to political refugees.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in my opinion, this is a good and sound editorial. The first paragraph of the editorial reads as follows:

Cuba's Fidel Castro, who may be excused for feeling his oats, talks tough. He demands that the United States return to Cuba some "traitors" whom Castro wants punished. It is unlikely that he will get them back—at least not with any help from the United States Government. For the Cubans who have fled to this country have come here seeking the historic privilege of asylum that the United States has offered political refugees since the early days of the Republic.

The editorial goes on and discusses at some length this question of political asylum.

Undoubtedly, in due course of time, we will be confronted with the question of requests for extradition of some of the Cubans who have taken asylum in the United States. I wish to say I would not favor our giving asylum to escaped criminals. I only want to point out that the policy of extradition is one with great history in the field of international law as we have followed it in our country.

Certainly I think we should be willing to extradite or agree to the extradition of an escaped criminal from any country. It may be that some who have fled Cuba meet that definition.

I also point out, Mr. President, that we have been exceedingly liberal—and I think rightly so—in the application of the concept of a political refugee, the individual who escapes because of political differences, because he has been a member of a political organization, with which we may find ourselves completely in disagreement, involved in a revolution, or has been a member of an organization seeking to put down a revolution, and finds it necessary for his own personal survival to escape to a foreign country, sometimes our own.

My position has always been a very consistent one on this matter. I remember that 2 or 3 years ago I stood on the floor of the Senate and protested a proposal to extradite to the Nationalist Chinese, to Formosa, a man who appeared to be a political refugee from the regime of Chiang Kai-shek in Formosa, who was then living in Chicago. It seemed to me, on the basis of such facts as I could obtain, that sending this man from Chicago to Formosa meant we would be sending him back to certain execution. The case record seemed to be one which clearly showed the man to be a political refugee and not what we could call a domestic criminal of the country seeking his extradition.

I am not taking any position today with any finality with respect to any refugee who has fled Cuba to the United States. As chairman of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations which deals with Latin American affairs, I know that at least some of those who have fled Cuba are truly political refugees. I would view with great concern any policy of the United States State Department which would extradite those persons to Cuba without an exceedingly thorough investigation in connection with the distinction between one who should be extradited because he is a criminal guilty of violating the criminal laws of Cuba and one who, in fact, is a political refugee from the Batista regime.

I say that, Mr. President, as one whose record is perfectly clear in the Senate. None of my colleagues in the Senate has been more outspoken or was more outspoken earlier than the senior Senator from Oregon in criticism of the Batista regime. As I have said on the floor of the Senate on several occasions, it was clearly a dictatorial, Fascist-like regime.

Mr. President, that has nothing to do with the question of political asylum. When one escapes from such a regime as a refugee and takes refuge in the doctrine of asylum, I think we would be guilty of an unconscionable foreign policy action if we should yield to any demand of Castro for a blanket extradition of Cubans who may have fled to the United States since the successful Castro revolution.

In any case, I repeat, if an examination of the case history of the individual concerned shows that the extradition should be granted on the basis that he is a criminal and not a refugee from the Batista regime, a refugee because of his participation in the Batista regime, then I would give due consideration to such a request for extradition.

I have made these remarks on this subject today, Mr. President, because I think the Eugene Register-Guard editorial is particularly apropos.

I desire to speak on another subject, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

HEALTH INSURANCE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I turn now to another editorial which was published in the February 6 issue of the Oregon Labor Press entitled "We Need Two Kinds of Health Insurance—Now," and I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE NEED TWO KINDS OF HEALTH INSURANCE—NOW

A wise man said: "It is the proper function of Government to do for the people what they cannot do for themselves."

We all accept this definition as it is applied across a wide spectrum of governmental functions, ranging from local fire protection to the conduct of foreign policy, from public schools to satellite research.

But it seems to us that one vital and proper function of government has been too long neglected, and that is medical and hospital care.

Consider these four facts:

1. A prolonged and serious illness can wipe out the life savings and financial security of any moderate-income family. Even well-to-do families can be pauperized by medical and hospital costs.

2. The only Americans who can afford a long and serious illness are the very poor (who must rely on charity), the very rich, and those who are lucky enough to be covered by some group insurance plan.

3. Despite the recent growth of union health and welfare plans, and other forms of group medical insurance, only a small percentage of our population has such coverage—and it is often inadequate when serious illness strikes.

4. Those who have the greatest need for medical-hospital insurance are least likely to have it. This is particularly true of the elderly and the retired.

Medical and hospital care is certainly an area of crying human need where the Government could do for the people what they cannot do for themselves.

Many governments (far less wealthy than our own) have accepted this responsibility to their citizens—and have done so with outstanding success. Britain, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark are four good examples.

But in the United States, every slightest move in the direction of Government sponsored health insurance has been blocked by the American Medical Association with its wolfcry of socialized medicine. We are glad to hear that there is now a possibility that the AMA may slightly soften its attitude.

We are not urging that this session of Congress consider an all-out national health insurance program. Such a proposal would only cause a hopeless knock-down-and-drag-out fight. But we are urging this Congress to enact two health insurance measures:

First, the Forand bill. This would provide medical and hospital care under the social security system, for those who are receiving social security benefits. These older people have the greatest need for medical-hospital care, and very few of them can provide it for themselves through group insurance or personal savings.

Second, Government insurance to cover all citizens for long, serious and expensive illnesses. This is sometimes known as "catastrophic" sickness insurance, for it would cover only those illnesses which spell financial disaster to any ordinary family.

The idea is simple enough. It's like a deductible auto damage policy. Run-of-the-mill medical expenses would not be covered. But every family would be protected from the huge expense and financial ruin that prolonged and serious illness can bring.

Government sponsored insurance of this kind was once proposed (and soon forgotten) by the Eisenhower administration. There were many shortcomings in the proposed bill, but at least the administration recognized the principle that the Federal Government alone can provide insurance against medical-financial disaster.

We assume that both of these measures will be fought by the American Medical Association and by the insurance companies. But the will of the people can overcome their opposition. These are matters of deep human need, where Government should fulfill its proper function.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, some days ago in the Senate I again offered my proposed amendment to the social security law which seeks to set up insurance protection by way of an amendment to the social security law for the elderly people in this country with respect to hospitalization and medical costs. The editorial which I have just obtained permission to have printed in the RECORD, Mr. President, is an excellent editorial which supports the principle of protection for the elderly people which is encompassed in the amendment I introduced the other day. I recommend it for reading by all Senators.

I now desire to turn to another subject, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

THE REA PROGRAM MUST NOT BE SCUTTLED

Mr. MORSE. I now desire to make a brief speech for the RECORD in support of the REA program. I speak under the subject of "The REA Program Must Not Be Scuttled."

LIGHT DISPLACES KEROSENE DARKNESS UNDER REA

Mr. President, one of the fine and far-sighted programs which came to the people of America during the administration of one of our greatest Presidents, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, was that of the Rural Electrification Administration.

Prior to the inception of this program, thousands of rural Americans lived in kerosene darkness and American farmers and farm wives endured long hours of hard work bordering on drudgery because they labored without the benefit of the miracle which is electricity.

I speak on this phase of the subject, Mr. President, with some unforgettable memories of youth in regard to the kerosene darkness of the farm, because all through my boyhood and up until the time I was ready for college, I experienced, morning and night, the kerosene darkness of the dairy barn. We milked by hand 35 to 40 cows, morning and night, without the benefit of the labor-saving electricity which now really performs miracles on the modern dairy farm. Therefore, I speak with some experience, and no doubt with some feeling, about the great benefits REA has brought to the American farmer and the American farm wife.

DISINTEREST OF THE PRIVATE ELECTRIC UTILITIES

The pleas of the farmers that the private electric utilities bring cheap electric power to their farms were met in too many instances by the negative response that it was simply too expensive to bring transmission lines to the more distant rural areas. However, the private electric utilities told the farmers, with tongue in cheek, that they would be delighted to bring electric service to the farm provided the farmer would pay for the cost of the transmission line. This usually ended the pleas of the farmers for private electric utility service, because at that point they received a distinct shock—not an electric shock—but the shock of being informed that they would have to pay as much as one, two and sometimes three thousand dollars, as the case might be, for bringing the transmission lines to the farmer's gate.

Mr. President, it is little wonder, then, that America's farmers, their spokesmen, and the Congress of the United States wholeheartedly supported an REA prigram in the mid 1930's. Their foresight helped make America's farms the finest in the world.

The REA program illustrates a phase of American democracy at work, but like democracy itself, it is something for which we must work and fight vigilantly if we are to retain it.

REA PROGRAM THREATENED

In recent years the private electric utilities and the moneylenders have taken a long, hard look at the rural electric cooperatives. The private electric utilities would like to enjoy the business now handled by the successful electric cooperatives and in some instances they would like to eliminate the telltale electric power-cost yardstick that exposes in not too good light many of the management practices and the rate structures of the private electric utilities.

The moneylenders look at the electric cooperatives with covetous glances because they observe an opportunity to make some quick and highly profitable interest dollars if the administration's interest rate increase for the electric cooperatives goes into effect. At least, the moneylenders feel they would enjoy this interest-rate feast until the REA cooperative operations were abandoned or taken over by the private electric utilities.

THE DRIVE FOR HIGHER INTEREST RATES

The present administration has joined for several years past in an onslaught against the rural electric cooperatives by way of an insistence upon the payment of higher rates of interest on REA loans. This undermining activity against the electric cooperatives was brought into clear light last week when President Eisenhower addressed the 17th annual meeting of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association here in Washington. The President's speech was short, but it was almost unbelievable in its clear declaration of war on the present REA interest-rate program. It is so astounding that I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the President's speech of February 11, 1959, be included in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the speech may be printed in the RECORD as requested.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. MORSE. The President's speech was given as one of the highlights of the annual meeting that brought more than 7,000 representatives of rural electric cooperatives to Washington, D.C., from nearly every section of the United States.

The President hurriedly passed over a complimentary remark or two in order to get to the main theme of his address—an admonishment of the rural electric cooperatives for wanting Federal loan funds at the rate of interest adopted by Congress. The President implied that the REA program had fulfilled the goals for which it was established. Therefore, he concluded that the cooperatives should seek whatever capital they might need at higher interest rates.

What must have been particularly disturbing to those in the audience when the President delivered his REA speech was his suggestion that any individual or organization that looked to the Federal Government for "special help"—meaning financial assistance—after the Government had made "special provision," no longer would be "a fully independent, sturdy, and useful member of society." These remarks, which were aimed squarely at the REA cooperatives, should be resented not only by the thousands upon thousands of Americans in our rural areas by whom the benefits of the REA program are now being enjoyed, but also by the other Americans who feel that higher standards of living in our rural areas make America a greater and stronger nation.

The clear inference of the President's speech was unmistakable: If you continue to enjoy the benefits of interest rates fixed by Congress for the REA program, you are getting an unjustifiable handout from the Government.

The delegates to the meeting were stunned by the President's speech and his inference that they should be ashamed to continue to borrow from the Government at the interest rate now in effect. The President's speech stood out in sharp contrast with comments made by Senate Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON, by Speaker SAM RAYBURN, and by many other Senators and Representatives. I wish to commend these colleagues in the Congress for their support of the REA program.

As one who has constantly fought for the REA program and all other programs which I have felt would enhance the general welfare, I feel that it is incumbent upon me to review the accusations and recommendations of the President to see how they square with the facts and with the intent of Congress at the time the REA legislation was enacted and at the present time.

THE REA YESTERDAY AND TODAY

What was the intent of Congress in 1936? Broadly, it was to bring light and power to people in rural areas who were unable to get that service from the private power companies which often were already in those areas serving urban consumers and the few farms that could be served profitably.

Has the REA fulfilled this goal?

When the program began, less than 11 percent of rural homes had central station electric light and power. Today, more than 95 percent of such homes have this service. I must say at this point that this achievement has been made against the heaviest kinds of odds. The cooperatives had to obtain wholesale power from whatever sources they could find and often had to pay high rates for it. A few of them had to establish their own generation and transmission systems. Distances between consumers were usually great and over rough and wild terrain. Even today there is an average of only about three consumers per mile of line, a sparsity that does not lend itself to profitable operation. In recent years the carping criticism of the administration has been an additional obstacle, making the future of the program uncertain.

What was the interest of Congress in 1936? Was it the intention of Congress to provide electric service in rural areas for profit? No. The goal was and always has been to provide this service at the lowest possible cost. The cooperative form of nonprofit organization was recognized as the best way to carry out this program, and with the exception of a few nonprofit public power districts, the cooperatives have carried the burden of the program.

REA NOT A BURDEN ON TAXPAYERS

Was it the intent of Congress to give financial grants or subsidies to the cooperatives? Have they been given such grants? The answer to both questions is, No. The cooperatives were formed by groups of rural people who needed service, but who had little money to pay for it themselves. As a rule each member paid a $5 or $10 membership. The money required to set up the distribution system, or in a few cases a generation and transmission system, was borrowed from the Rural Electrification Administration with interest at 2 percent. During the period 1935 to 1944, a fluctuating rate of interest was authorized, but in 1944 the rate was established at 2 percent where it has remained since that time. The loan period was extended from 25 to 35 years at that time. From the beginning, the repayment record of the cooperatives has been remarkably good.

As of July 1, 1958, electric borrowers had paid to the Government a total of more than $1 billion on their loans. This includes $546 million repaid on principal, $328 million paid in interest, and $128.7 million paid ahead of schedule. Only four borrowers were overdue in payments amounting to a total of only $106,619. The REA also estimates that over $1 billion worth of electrical appliances and chore equipment will be bought this year by consumer members of rural electrics. This means more jobs, good jobs, in the cities.

The program thus has not cost the Government 1 red cent. On the contrary, the Government is collecting more than it has been paying out and will continue to do so in the future. Where is the subsidy in that? From where will come the wards of society under a pay-as-you-build program such as this?

Mr. President, it is up to us to decide whether rural America shall continue to receive electric power at reasonable rates through the facilities of the REA program as it is now envisaged, or whether we shall go backward more than 20 years to another era in which America's farms will have to pay dearly for whatever electricity they may receive.

We know that the private utilities prefer to do business in areas where customers are plentiful and transmission lines are not extended beyond heavily populated communities. The electric utilities proved time and again that they were reluctant to serve the needs of our rural areas because the plentiful profit dollars were not there.

REA PROGRAM NEEDED IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

Once again, we are faced with the basic question of whether it is worth it to the Nation as a whole to have a strong REA program which will bring abundant electric power to our farms. In the past, we have considered this to be a worthy objective for Federal support of the REA program. I think we were absolutely right in doing as a Government what the private electric utilities refused to do, namely, help Americans help themselves to bring low-cost power to even the most remote areas. If we scuttle the REA program by making it impossible or highly expensive to construct and maintain electric transmission facilities in our remote areas, we will have paid a great price, not only by way of high electric power rates but also by way of reduced standards of living in our rural areas.

Federal funds for REA should not be carried as an expense in the budget in any case. In the last session of Congress I introduced a bill which, for budgetary purposes, distinguished between Federal funds invested or loaned for wealth producing resource development, on one hand, and funds dissipated in meeting current Government expenses on the other. We still need legislation, which I shall introduce shortly, to clear up this misleading picture, about which I spoke rather briefly yesterday afternoon on the floor of the Senate.

Did Congress prescribe limitations on the loans that could be made to a cooperative? Wisely, the Congress reserved the loanmaking authority for the Administrator of the REA.

Under Government Reorganization Plan No. 2, the Secretary of Agriculture took from the Administrator the approval of loans of $500,000 and more, and all new loans and put it in the hands of one of the subordinates in the Secretary's office. The Humphrey-Price bill to restore this authority to the Administrator is expected to come up for congressional debate in the near future. I hope that this bill will be enacted into law.

REA SYSTEMS MUST BE IMPROVED NOT SCUTTLED

Except for this approval by the Secretary of Agriculture's office, loans for new construction and for later expansion are judged on their own merits. It is indeed fortunate that restrictions were not placed on the amount that could be borrowed by a given system. Because of the nature of power transmission, the need for heavier cable, transformers, and the like, increases with the addition of new customers and with new higher levels of current utilization. This has necessitated new loans to "heavy up" the facilities of most systems. Had these loans not been available the service to consumers on REA lines would be inferior and antiquated. With power use doubling about every 5 years, these supplemental loans have been necessary and the demand for more power will continue. The need for loan funds will, therefore, continue in the future. Does the Congress want or expect these nonprofit cooperatives to go into the open money market to meet the expansion that must continue?

Was, and is, the intent of Congress only to have a bare light bulb hanging from the ceiling of every rural home in the country?

I am sure that Speaker RAYBURN and the late Senator Norris did not intend that REA subscribers should get along with less light and power than their city cousins. If more power must be put on the lines to operate the silo fillers, the milking machines and the water pumps on the farm, and the television sets, deep freezers and washing machines in the rural homes, then the means must be provided to get that power on the lines. This is why loan funds will be needed by REA this year and in the coming years. This is also why low rates of interest are still essential to the continued success of the program. They are essential to a dynamic, rather than a static, plan for our rural homes.

Low rates of interest were provided by Congress to give the program a chance to get started. They are needed today to finish that job and to make it possible for the established co-ops to continue to provide service equal to that given by power companies who serve in compact areas which are more profitable to serve. Low rates of interest are required now because, as power requirements increase the costs of "heavying up" the system go up sharply, but income does not rise proportionally. As power use goes up the user gets the advantage of lower rates. The result is smaller margins for the co-ops, because their primary objective is to serve their members in the best manner possible.

As stated earlier, the repayment of principal and interest has been excellent. In this connection it should be pointed out that according to David Hamil, the present Administrator of the REA, in his statement to congressional appropriations committees, the number of cooperatives that are not making enough to meet debt service is gradually rising. In 1956 there were 138 systems unable to meet debt service; in 1957 there were 141; and, I am advised that his figures show that as of June 30, 1958, 166 systems—just under 20 percent of the active borrowers—failed to meet debt service. It is true that most of these systems made their payments to the Government, but they did so by using funds which, by sound accounting procedures, should have been put into various reserve funds—depreciation reserves and reserves for emergencies.

How would a rise in interest rates affect these systems that are just barely getting by now? To them it would be a death warrant. To most systems it would mean higher rates or poorer service. Certainly this is not the intent of Congress.

As an interesting sidelight on this subject, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be included at this point in my remarks an editorial that appeared in the Washington Post of February 9, 1959, entitled "Realism on REA."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REALISM ON REA

The convention of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association which begins today in the National Guard Armory will generate much criticism of the administration's power policies. President Eisenhower's private power predilection is not above criticism of course, but the reexamination of the REA program which the administration is seeking surely is needed. The program has fulfilled its original goals of 1935 and there is a real question whether the Government should continue its present REA role.

At a relatively small cost to the Federal Government the REA loan program not only has brought the benefits of electricity to rural America, but it has also greatly expanded the market for electrical appliances and other equipment. Hundreds of thousands of Americans who may have never been on a farm have been indirect beneficiaries of this farsighted program.

But should the Government continue to provide extremely low cost loans to REA co-ops that are going concerns and in many cases have become highly successful electric utilities? Once an REA co-op is established ought it not to seek its capital in the open market as other utilities do?

When Congress set up the REA loan program in 1935 to bring electricity to farmers only 11 percent of the persons who lived in rural areas had electric lights and power. Today 95 percent of them enjoy such service. Now the REA loans, which still bear an interest rate of only 2 percent, are being used to expand and improve existing co-ops. President Eisenhower has recommended that REA financing be gradually shifted to non-Government sources.

Perhaps the Government should not completely withdraw from REA financing. There may be some situations where direct Government loans are still needed, but it would seem reasonable for the Government to limit its participation generally to the insurance of loans or some other indirect device which would let the REA co-ops build on their own strong foundations with a minimum of Federal aid. The not inconsiderable resources of the NRECA and the very size of its convention, which will be attended by more than 7,000 delegates, indicate the strength of the REA co-ops.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the editor of the Post should have captioned his editorial "Some Unrealistic Remarks on REA," because this editorial certainly blows hot and cold in the same breath. If taken seriously, and I am sure it will not be taken seriously, it would strike a blow at the REA program and to thousands of rural families across the United States.

The Washington Post editorial on the REA was answered promptly in an excellent letter to the editor of the Washington Post dated February 11, 1959, written by Mr. William Roberts, of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Robert's reply be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter to the editor was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REALISM ON REA

We want to express appreciation for your warm editorial treatment of the rural electrification program ("Realism on REA," February 9). It's true, as you said, that the REA loan program has brought the benefits of electricity to rural America and that it has greatly expanded the market for electrical appliances and other equipment.

But, your editorial says, "Once an REA co-op is established, ought it not to seek its capital in the open market?" We say no. And here's why:

On February 8 REA Administrator Hamil was asked, "Has REA made a real study of the damage that would be done to the rural electric systems if the administration's interest hike proposals should be adopted, forcing them into the open market for capital?"

The Administrator admitted no real study has been made. He thinks his delegation from Congress prohibits this. Hamil added that, for his own information, he asked his staff to study 25 percent loans. These, according to the Administrator, were among the strongest systems financially. At least no new feasibility study was necessary on any of these applications. These systems had demonstrated their ability to meet all obligations, at the present interest rate.

Of the 25, he concluded that 17 could still meet their obligations to their members and the Government, if the interest rate was raised to 4 percent. Unanswered, perhaps because it was not asked, was the implied question, "What will happen to the people served by the other eight systems?" In our opinion, the systems would be in deep water financially.

Their only possible out would be to raise rates, which historically cuts down usage, retards growth, and starts a vicious circle which could lead to bankruptcy.

Now our question is, "Don't you think the various Administration proposals, which would greatly increase the cost of capital funds to the co-op, deserve the full study?"

We ask this because our research shows that the rural electrics could probably not expect to get a rate as low as 4 percent from private sources. We think this effort to increase interest rates is just another attempt to destroy a program that has been so beneficial to America.

WILLIAM S. ROBERTS,
Director, Publications and Member Education Department, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association.
WASHINGTON.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, an impressive disclosure of the contrast between the activities of the private electric utilities and rural electric cooperatives in my home State of Oregon appears in a fine editorial of the February 1959 issue of the Northwest Ruralite, entitled "Utilities Want Dough." I ask unanimous consent that the Northwest Ruralite editorial be included at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UTILITIES WANT DOUGH

Power company rates are going up in Oregon and Washington. Pacific Power & Light and Portland General Electric are filing requests for increases with the State regulatory agencies amounting in some cases to as much as a 15-percent increase.

These proposed increases are interesting, in view of the fact that the investor-owned companies serve rich markets. Their operating expenses are, on the whole, much less in proportion to their revenues, than are those of the smaller, largely rural, cooperatives and PUD's.

Since the companies made their announcements, none of the small consumer-owned agencies has announced rate increases.

A number have, in fact, stated that, although their expenses are going up, they have no plans for such increases.

In a great many cases consumer-utility rates have already been substantially lower than power company rates, and the company increases will widen the gap.

However, inflation is hitting the little utilities, too, and it is wholly likely that a number of them may find it necessary, during the coming months, to boost rates somewhat—although it appears unlikely that, by so doing, they'll narrow the price gap.

Another interesting fact about the pending company increases is the pattern they show. They appear not to be boosting prices in areas where they face co-op and municipal power competition.

Willard Johnson, manager of the Hood River Electric Cooperative, recently sent a letter to his members which describes this peculiar situation. We quote:

"This rate increase request is for a system-wide increase of 15 percent in Oregon with the exception of Hood River rural area, The Dalles, Springfield, part of Umatilla County, and Tillamook. In each area excepted, there is an active cooperative, PUD, or municipal system in direct competition. It could be that Portland, Astoria, Albany, Hood River City, and others will bear the cost of this competition. It seems to us that the signers of the petition last June, which kept HREC lines out of Hood River City, should reevaluate the wisdom of that signing. Their loyalty is now to be rewarded by a rate increase of 15 percent while their country neighbors will have no increase at all. HREC rates are now approximately 17 percent below Hood River City rates. Add 15 percent to this and you get 32 percent—nearly one-third more that the city customer will pay than does his country neighbor.

"Outgoing PUC Commissioner Howard Morgan saw these and other discrepancies in the rate filing and ordered it suspended for not to exceed 6 months until the entire matter could be thoroughly studied. His successor will take final action on the matter, and no one knows what the outcome will be.

"Meanwhile, we take pride in pointing out to the people of Hood River Valley the direct and indirect benefits to them from the existing local cooperative. It is truly the yardstick in electric rates."

Mr. MORSE. In closing, Mr. President, I should like to ask these questions:

Who are the members of the rural electric cooperatives? Who were the representatives attending the 17th annual meeting of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association? Were they wild-eyed radicals bent on socializing the country or throwing the Federal financial program out of gear?

Such a characterization is completely absurd. We all saw these people. They are the backbone of America. This group is made up of local leaders from hundreds of counties in 46 States. In their communities they are members of the great farm organizations, the churches, the community clubs, school boards, and the like. They are men and women of good faith who want nothing better than to see our people go forward in peace and prosperity.

I admit that the administration has shown little regard for this kind of people. These people do not clip coupons. By and large, they do not have time to become expert golfers or to enjoy the delights of quail hunting. They do not receive the benefits of the high interest rates and hidden subsidies this administration is so fond of. But they are important people who do important jobs for their communities and for the Nation.

I for one am not ready to feed these people to the moneylending lions, and I do not believe my colleagues are ready to do that, either. I think the REA program, with its enormous social and economic benefits to the Nation, will continue in the future just as it has in the past. At least, a good many of us in the Senate and House will fight to the best of our abilities to preserve and improve the present REA program in the best public interest.

What I said today is a prelude to what I believe will be a very important debate in this session of Congress, if the administration attempts to carry out the implied proposal of the President in his speech at the REA convention, namely, to increase the interest rate and turn the REA program over to the moneychangers in the administration's economic temple.

EXHIBIT 1

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT AT THE 17TH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE NATIONAL RURAL ELECTRIC COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, HELD AT THE NATIONAL GUARD ARMORY, WASHINGTON, D.C., FEBRUARY 11, 1959

I am delighted to meet with the representatives of the rural electrification systems. I salute you and those you represent for a job well done.

I understand there has been a little advance billing here of my alleged views on matters of interest to you. Well, I am here to set forth my views accurately and frankly, in what I believe to be your own interest as in the interest of our country.

We all know that when the REA was born, less than 11 percent of our farms had central station electric service. Today, more than 95 percent of our farms have central electric service. Your record of meeting loan repayments on time or ahead of schedule is oustanding. Your achievements have encouraged the growth of both rural residences and rural industries.

Much of this growth has taken place these past 6 years. Since January 1, 1953, you have added some 800,000 new consumers; your net worth has more than doubled, every loan need has been met.

All of us know that in this particular administration, the REA has experienced the greatest financial growth in all history.

As we look ahead certainly we are anxious that the future growth of REA be based upon sound principles—principles that are sound for REA and for the entire Nation.

America at this very moment is engaged in a great debate on the role of Government in the lives of her citizens. A part of this debate revolves around the question: Shall Government live within its means; shall our citizens, in a prosperous time, meet the cost of the service they desire of their Government?

Or is it to be our established policy to follow the ruinous route of free republics of the ages past—the route of deficit financing, of inflation, of taxes ever rising, until all initiative and self-reliant enterprise are destroyed? This route, I remind you, is one that would surely torpedo all the great achievements of your organizations in the past quarter century.

My view on this issue is clear, and, I hope, well known.

I believe profoundly that we must, in these times, not fail to live within our means. I believe this is the view of most Americans.

I believe all of us want a healthy, free economy—one that will produce growth in terms of real goods, real services, real wages. Surely none of us favors actions that tend to debase our currency.

I believe further that most of you and your organizations are equally dedicated to these principles. Moreover, now that your systems have arrived at a state of maturity, I am sure you want to make the kind of contribution all of us must make as citizens toward a goal of fiscal soundness throughout America. To this end, none of us should add to the burdens of the general citizenry by insisting upon a favored position.

Now I come to one point on which I realize full well there is some disagreement. Parenthetically I feel obliged to say this: I believe we are not going to find a decent solution to any of these differences—or to any other serious problems facing our country—by resort to demagoguery that seeks support for a special position.

One difference of which I speak is the rate of interest paid by persons and agencies who borrow money from the Federal Treasury. Specifically I refer to programs—such as REA and college housing—in which borrowers do not pay interest rates equal to the cost of money to the Government, but are capable of doing so.

I have recommended that the Congress authorize the Treasury to set these rates at a level that will recover the cost of the money loaned. This recommendation would not raise interest rates now in effect on outstanding REA loans, for these loans are firm contracts between your member cooperatives and the Federal Government.

Such a development could unquestionably be in the public interest. I do not intend, nor does this administration believe, that these future interest rate changes would be harmful in any way, nor can they be, to your systems.

Ideally, in federally sponsored and financed undertakings it should be possible for the Government to step progressively aside as they reach the stage of self-sufficiency which enables them to move forward under their own sound management, ownership and financing.

Here I hope you will indulge me in a little philosophizing about our Government and how it relates, to my way of thinking, to each one of us.

I believe that government, at all levels, has certain clear obligations to you and me. It owes us security from external attack, protection of our person and property, protection in the exercise of all the individual rights guaranteed by our Constitution.

Further, Government may, if it so chooses, do a number of things for all our people that benefit you and me as citizens. For example, it may support certain medical services we need; establish schools to assist in the education of our children, and prevent pollution of the air and water we use.

Beyond this the Government may also undertake special activities in favor of particular groups, of which you and I may be members. This is sometimes done not only for humanitarian purposes, but also to equalize economic opportunity among different areas, or groupings, and to prevent disaster in some sector of our economy from hurting too much the entire economy and population of the country.

We have, for instance, farm programs, housing assistance, urban renewal, the REA, and so on. The effort here is not to give to one group of citizens special privilege or undeserved advantage. Rather it is to see that equality of opportunity is not withheld from the citizen through no fault of his own.

These and many other things our Government does for you and me. In return we have certain obligations. Payment of taxes, obedience to the laws, readiness for military service in emergency are examples. In addition, it is our obligation, if we belong to one of the groups for which the Government has made special provision, to use that help responsibly and constructively, and to do our level best to reestablish speedily our own equality of opportunity, and so share proportionately in the productivity of our economy.

When this has been accomplished, and our special requirements satisfied, then certainly I do not need, do not deserve, and should not accept any special help from the Government. If I do so, I help deny equality of opportunity to all my fellow citizens. No longer am I a fully independent, sturdy, and useful member of society. Rather I am, to the extent I profit unfairly at the expense of others, dependent upon their bounty.

These beliefs lead to the conviction that the great success of REA justifies the adjustment in future interest rates that I have suggested.

I believe we have reached a point where REA is no longer an infant enterprise. You have grown wonderfully through your infancy and adolescence. Now in your prideful maturity, it is my earnest desire to see the local enterprises you represent become even stronger and more self-sufficient.

I like to think that the program which lighted the farm homes of America will also help illuminate the path to sound finance, good government, and responsible citizenship.

It is my earnest desire that these broad gage goals will unit us all as we plan confidently for your future and the future of our country.

Thank you and best wishes for the journey ahead.

PROPOSED SALE OF NORTH DAKOTA STATE-OWNED MILL AND ELEVATOR

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on February 5, 1959, Mr. Donald M. Sandberg, of Minneapolis, Minn., a member of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, wrote a letter to the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], who is the present occupant of the chair, in connection with the speech I delivered on January 17 of this year relative to the proposed selling of the State mill and elevator owned and operated by the State of North Dakota. I desire to reply to that letter today. In connection therewith, I ask unanimous consent that the various documents which I have with me may be printed at the appropriate places in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on January 17, 1959, I spoke of a very serious issue that may confront the people of North Dakota, in the latest attempt by certain individuals in North Dakota who would assist the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce and others in skinning the farmer by selling or closing the State-owned and operated mill and elevator.

I pointed out the great benefits that the people of North Dakota—and, for that matter, of the entire Northwest—have gained through the State-owned mill and elevator. I noted how in July 1937, while I was Governor of North Dakota, the State mill and elevator played an important role in preventing the North Dakota wheat farmer from ruin as a result of an overnight drop of 52 cents per bushel for wheat, with the immediate raising, by the North Dakota Industrial Commission, of the price of 37-pound wheat 35 cents a bushel and thereby stabilizing its price. Also, had it not been for the State mill and elevator, the grain gamblers in Minneapolis would have robbed the farmers of between $12 million and $14 million.

In case any Senator did not happen to read my speech of January 17, I most respectfully refer him to it, because what I said at that time is absolutely unanswerable.

Mr. President, recently I have received a copy of a letter from Mr. Donald M. Sandberg, 5120 Emerson Avenue South, Minneapolis, Minn., addressed to the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], in which Mr. Sandberg berates the senior Senator from North Dakota for the speech that he made on the Senate floor on the subject of the "State Mill and Elevator." The contents of that letter are as follows:

FEBRUARY 5, 1959.

Senator EUGENE MCCARTHY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Just today I read in a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a slanderous attack made by Senator WILLIAM LANGER upon the membership of the Minneapolis Grain Exchange and the grain trade generally. This politically inspired document is undoubtedly being sent to his constituency in an effort to prove his worth as a friend of the North Dakota agriculture. In this pamphlet, he has accused the membership of thievery and malice. As a member of this organization, I refuse to stand for this libelous attack on the moral fiber of my business associates and myself.

The Minneapolis Grain Exchange is now, as it has been for over 75 years, a friend of the farmer and consumer alike. It is an organization that provides a common meeting place for buyer and seller and which publicizes the transactions that take place during its marketing sessions. It has seen bull and bear markets and has dutifully recorded the events that make for these economic happenings. Economic facts must be faced, and through the process of a free market these facts are faced each day. Sometimes the verdict is not the exact one desired by either the buyer or seller, but it is as close to the truth as can be decided with the information at hand. Given the true situation, the market does what it has to do—and, money, effort, doubletalk, scheming and skulduggery cannot stop it.

It is surprising to hear a man of Senator LANGER'S years reviling the truth and on the floor of the U.S. Senate as well. He certainly owes an apology to those who have served and are still serving his beloved North Dakota State mill on the trading floor at the Minneapolis grain exchange.

I speak for myself since I do not know whether our able leadership will dignify Senator LANGER'S imprudent remarks with an answer.

Yours very truly,

DONALD M. SANDBERG.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Mr. President, quoting a part of Mr. Sandberg's letter, he states:

The Minneapolis Grain Exchange is now, as it has been for over 75 years, a friend of the farmer and consumer alike.

Mr. President, being active in public life in the State of North Dakota for many, many years, I am well acquainted with the battles for survival that the farmer has had over the years with the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and the large grain elevators operating out of the Twin Cities. Time does not permit me to go into a full discussion of these problems at this time, but I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate just a few chapters of these many struggles, and let Senators judge for themselves.

I go back to 1914, because that was when the State mill and elevator was organized, for the protection of the farmers themselves. The legislature, the majority of whom were elected, passed an act creating the State mill and elevator. It was referred to the people of North Dakota, who overwhelmingly endorsed it. The mill was opened for business in 1922. They did it because of the very action of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce which I shall now describe.

As I have said, in 1914, the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, a nonstock or membership group, organized and existing for the profit of its members, conducted a grain market, for the exclusive use of its members, wherein approximately 200 million bushels of grain were dealt in annually by them. The chamber dealt in valuable business and commercial information, consisting chiefly of price quotations on various kinds of grain and other market news. The grain market furnished by the chamber was the exclusive use of its members in six States, and it held a monopoly of such business. At that time there was the Equity Cooperative Exchange, also hereinafter referred to as "the 7,000 farmers," with offices in various States, and having a membership of about 7,000 grain raisers, shippers, and dealers living in North Dakota and the various States of the Northwest. That association was the receiving and selling agent for grain shipped to it by its members. It operated terminal and country elevators in various States. It was engaged also in disseminating market information, and it conducted its business on the basis of paying patronage dividends, which mean division of profits among its patrons in proportion to patronage.

Because of the patronage dividend character of the 7,000 farmers' equity, the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis barred them, resulting in the establishment of the St. Paul Grain Exchange at St. Paul, Minn., in 1914. This brought the 7,000 farmers and the St. Paul Exchange in direct business competition with the members of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis.

The Minneapolis Chamber then began a conspiracy and campaign to destroy the St. Paul Exchange and the business of the 7,000 farmers for the purpose of perpetuating the monopoly of the chamber of commerce and its members.

Mr. President, this is definitely not just a matter of one competitor's trying to outdo the other; but this situation was so serious that the Federal Trade Commission proceeded against the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis. The Commission's findings, conclusions, and order requiring the Chamber of Commerce of Minnesota to cease unfair practices against the equity cooperative exchange were sustained by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

Let us examine the charges made by the Federal Trade Commission against the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the charges filed by the Federal Trade Commission against the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis. They are to be found on page 6 of exhibit No. 256.

There being no objection, the charges were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That this conspiracy has been and is being carried out by a campaign of defamation, false litigation, oppression and boycott. The defamation consisting (1) of publication, in the above trade paper and other publications, and circulation among patrons and prospective patrons, of the equity and of the exchange, of false statements concerning the financial responsibility and business methods of the equity and of the exchange; and (2) similar false statements by the traveling solicitors, agents and employees of many of the respondent members of the chamber. The false litigation consisting of instigating and carrying on, in 1914 and 1915, three designated actions against the equity and other members of the exchange, these actions being one brought in the U.S. District Court for Minnesota by J. Emerson Greenfield and Samuel Crumpton (partners as Greenfield & Crumpton); another in a State court of North Dakota, by Fred Schmidt, J. Emerson Greenfield and Samuel Crumpton; and another, in the same State court, by the State of North Dakota ex rel Henry J. Linde, attorney general. The oppression consisting in refusing the exchange and its members the daily market quotations of the chamber, which it disseminates to nonmembers of the chamber, and in inducing other terminal markets to refuse their like quotations. The boycott consisting in members of the chamber refusing, under compulsion of certain rules adopted by the chamber for that purpose, to buy grain from the equity.

That said conspiracy is further being executed under compulsion and by means of certain rules, regulations and customers of the chamber and its members, which discriminate against nonmembers; depress prices paid for grain bought from producers; impose arbitrary and unearned charges on "on track" grain at country points; discriminate in favor of grain shipped from certain other terminal markets; establish unreasonably high commission rates; and prevent the members of the chamber from transacting business on a true competitive basis or a "patronage dividend" basis.

That such conspiracy is being further executed through contracts binding country shippers to ship all of their grain to members of the chamber who finance such shippers.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, after full and extensive hearings on these charges, the Federal Trade Commission made certain findings of fact, conclusions, and an order, which I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, the Federal Trade Commission concluded that by reason of the facts set forth, the respondents and all of them had committed acts to the prejudice of the public and competitors of respondent chamber of commerce, of Minneapolis, which acts constituted unfair methods of competition in commerce within the intent and meaning of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

On appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals the court sustained the major part of the order of the Federal Trade Commission, and ordered the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and other respondents to forever cease and desist from combining and conspiring to injure or destroy the business or reputation of the St. Paul Exchange or the 7,000 farmers by, first, publishing any false or misleading statements concerning the financial standing of the business methods of the exchange or the 7,000 farmers, or by, second, instituting vexatious suits against the 7,000 farmers with the purpose of obstructing the business or injuring the credit or reputation of the 7,000 farmers.

The court further ordered the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and other respondents to forever cease and desist from conspiring and combining amongst themselves to directly or indirectly persuade or compel members of the chamber and others to refuse to buy from, or sell to, or otherwise deal with, the St. Paul Grain Exchange because of the patronage-dividend plan of doing business.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire findings of fact, conclusion, and order of the Federal Trade Commission and the order of the U.S. Court of Appeals be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, as Gov. Al Smith used to say, "Let us look at the record."

On page 22 of the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, in the case of Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and others against Federal Trade Commission, the court stated:

> The evidence supports the findings as to misleading publications and statement and as to instigation of vexatious litigation. The conclusion that such actions constituted "unfair methods of competition" was a proper legal conclusion from such findings.

Mr. President, what were those misleading publications and statements made against the 7,000 farmers? In the July 24, 1914, issue of the Fargo Forum, a Commission exhibit in the above case, the misleading statements were set forth in big, bold-type headlines, as follows: "Sensational Charges Made Against Equity Exchange. Direct Charge Is Made That False Statement Was Issued by Concern. Alleged the Books Show Loftus Was To Get One-Half of Gross Earnings of Minneapolis Office—Alleged Books Do Not Show All Actual Expenses."

There also was published the complaint in full filed in the District Court of North Dakota so as to embarrass the Equity Cooperative.

Mr. President, not only were these statements misleading, but according to the testimony of J. P. Dodson, principal stockholder and president of the Fargo Forum, the chamber of commerce ordered reprints of the July 24, 1914, issue, which were distributed without charge to the visitors at the State fairgrounds, and were mailed without charge to the visitors at the State fairgrounds and were mailed without charge to farmers throughout the State of North Dakota.

The chamber of commerce followed the same procedure concerning the July 26, 1914, article in the Fargo Courier-News, which carried these headlines on the front page: "Equity Exchange, Loftus, and Anderson Sued in Hennepin County Court for $20,000"; "Officers of Well-Known Grain Commission House Charged With Violation of Contract, Mismanagement, and Political Activity"; "Local Suit Excites Much Interest Among Farmer Stockholders in the Concern"; "Walter Thomson, Local Expert Accountant, Repudiates Alleged Statement by Him—Has Not Seen Firm's Books Since 1912."

This misleading newspaper account was also reprinted by the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and was distributed without charge to farmers and individuals in the State of North Dakota and Minnesota.

Mr. President, as charged by the complaint against the chamber, the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, through the Cooperative Manager and Farmer magazine, ordered 700,000 reprints of selected articles from the Cooperative Manager and Farmer magazine which were misleading and which slandered the 7,000 farmers and the St. Paul Grain Exchange. The devastating effect of the distribution of these misleading articles to farmers throughout the State of North Dakota can be best illustrated by the testimony on page 178 of the official transcript of the record of the above proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission which states as follows:

> That he [J. H. Adams] tried to convince his associate, the respondent, Fleming, and to convince the secretary of the respondent chamber of commerce that it was a mistake to continue these attacks on the equity cooperative exchange [the 7,000 farmers], and that he had written out a notice to the effect that the policy of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer in that respect was to be changed, and that he would have published this notice in the next issue of the paper, but his partner procured an injunction from the court enjoining him from carrying out his intention to publish such said notice, and that shortly after this he was forced by his said partner to disassociate himself from all connection with the paper.

So it seems, Mr. President, that even an ally of the chamber of commerce could no longer stomach the vicious campaign by the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis against the 7,000 farmers.

What type of misleading articles did the Cooperative Manager and Farmer magazine print against the 7,000 farmers? Here are some of the bold-type headlines taken at random from exhibits 37 and 37(a) in Federal Trade Commission proceedings against the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis:

> 1. The Cooperative and Farmer magazine, open letter No. 2 (sent to Railroad and Warehouse Commission of North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota; Attorney General, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota; County Attorney, Cass County, North Dakota, and others):
> Recent operations uncovered.
> Astounding state of facts of interest to every stockholder in the Equity Cooperative Exchange (the 7,000 farmers) and also members of the Society of Equity.
> 2. Equity Cooperative Exchange (the 7,000 farmers) exposed from the inside.
>
> The Equity Cooperative Exchange operated at a loss to its patrons.
>
> Sales to middlemen, scalpers, and dummies.
>
> Sales made below the market price.
> 3. Astounding charges of fraud against Equity Cooperative Exchange (the 7,000 farmers).
>
> Grain shippers of the Northwest were the victims.
> Fargo Courier News on Saturday April 24, 1915, states: "Grand jury may indict, said Linde."
>
> 4. The American Society of Equity is in hands of grafters.
> Some of the men higher up have hoodwinked the farmers who should begin their spring housecleaning early—the St. Paul investigation.

Mr. President, the findings of fact also showed that the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis instituted vexatious litigation against the farmers. This litigation was previously referred to in the complaint filed against the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis. One of the devastating effects of this vexatious litigation was that it cost the 7,000 farmers not less than $20,000 for attorneys' fees, witness fees, court fees, and other expenses directly attributed thereto.

Mr. President, as we know, there is a no more effective weapon of a giant monopoly in crushing out a new concern than to drag it through the courts and cause it to expend large sums of money to defend itself. As we know, that has been a favorite practice of giant monopolies against small business in this country in antitrust suits and patent suits. The Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis was not too concerned about the cost to them in this fight against the 7,000-farmer Equity Cooperative Exchange, because as Federal Trade Commission exhibit 126, at page 226, reveals, a letter written by the assistant secretary of the chamber to the secretary of the chamber dated September 9, 1915, states as follows:

> The estimate of $57,000 for association expenses does not include extra expenses and it is presumed that no more money will be required to fight the 7,000 Farmers' Equity Cooperative Association. But it should be borne in mind that next summer (1916) will be another political campaign and in January 1917, there will be another session of the legislature. Outside of these two facts, the association's (Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis) expense is figured on sufficiently high basis on ordinary items of expense.

Nor only was the chamber spending $57.000 to fight the 7,000 Farmer Equity, but it was also getting ready for funds to fight it in the political campaign in 1916, and before the State legislature in January 1917, as revealed by the assistant secretary's letter.

The public interest aroused in North Dakota because of the vexatious litigation directed toward the 7,000 farmer equity cooperative exchange by the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis resulted in the legislature providing for the establishment of the Bank of North Dakota, which was overwhelmingly supported by vote of the people.

Mr. President, I have taken excerpts from the testimony of several witnesses in the proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission, but it would be too cumbersome at this time to state their testimony supporting the charges made by the Federal Trade Commission against the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis. I ask unanimous consent that these excerpts of testimony be included at the completion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, as I stated on the floor of the Senate on the 17th day of January 1959, the farmer would be at the mercy of the giant grain trade in the twin cities if the State mill and elevator were ever sold or closed. The folks in North Dakota who advocated the selling of the State mill and elevator are not friends of the people, but are their enemies, who would sell out the people of North Dakota by permitting the grain trade of Minneapolis to stick their long, slimy, filthy hands into the pockets of the people and rob them. If these words shock Mr. Sandberg, it is too bad, for I want the Members of the Senate and the people of North Dakota to know that I will constantly fight the encroachment of giant monopolies in areas where they are in a position to wipe out the little man.

EXHIBIT 1

DOCKET NO. 964—BEFORE THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION—FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION v. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF MINNEAPOLIS ET AL.

FINDINGS, CONCLUSION, AND ORDER OF COMMISSION

Hearings were begun on this complaint September 5, 1922. Findings and conclusions and the cease and desist order, here involved, were made by the Commission on December 28, 1923.

Finding of fact

The respondents named as directors, officers, and members of the chamber were such and were fairly representative of the entire membership, as a class, which was so numerous that all could not be made parties without manifest inconvenience and oppressive delay.

The chamber was a nonstock or membership corporation conducting a grain exchange for the exclusive use and profit of its members, who were governed and bound by the charter, rules, regulations, usages and customs thereof. It was the largest wheat market in the United States and its members dealt, therein, in a large amount of grain, much of which was in interstate commerce. It dealt, also, in its own and other market quotations. About 90 percent of the grain received at Minneapolis was shipped to and dealt in by such members.

The Equity was a corporation with a large number of stockholders residing in several States and practically all of whom were raisers of grain which was shipped to the Equity as sales agents or to be bought and sold on its own account. Also, it owned about 75 country line elevators and a large terminal elevator in St. Paul. Much of the grain so dealt in by it was in interstate commerce. Since August 1914, its principal business office has been in St. Paul with other offices in North Dakota, Wisconsin, and Montana.

In August 1914, the exchange was organized by the Equity and others as a nonstock or membership grain exchange. Its rules did not prohibit patronage dividends, as did the rules of the chamber.

The members of the chamber are in competition in dealing in interstate commerce grain with the Equity and its stockholders and with the members of the Exchange.

The respondents, Adams and Fleming, were stockholders in the Publisher, the former being editor until October 1916, and the latter thereafter. The policy of the publication was dominated and controlled by the secretary of the chamber, who furnished the data and material for a great number of the articles hereinafter described.

The Uniform Commission Rule of the chamber, as applied to purchases of grain in carlots "on track" at country points, had a tendency to depress grain prices by limiting the price to that of similar shipments to the Minneapolis market.

Members were prohibited from rebating commissions or paying patronage dividends and membership was refused to cooperative associations, like the Equity, which allowed such dividends. This action of the chamber hindered and suppressed competition from cooperative terminal marketing of grain and protected the members of the chamber from the competition of such marketing.

The chamber permits market quotations of sales on its trading floor to be transmitted therefrom by telegraph companies in "continuous" (less than 10 minutes) or "periodical" (more than 10 minutes) services. This transmission is to other exchanges and nonmembers which are approved by the chamber with the right in the chamber to prohibit such services to anyone at its pleasure. It exercises complete control over the selection of those to whom such services are sent. Knowledge of such quotations are necessary to anyone dealing in carlot grain. After July 1914, the Equity and the Exchange applied for such services but were refused such by the chamber although each of them was ready, able and willing to pay therefor and to abide by and agree to all of the rules and regulations required of applicants and subscribers by the chamber and nothing in the conduct of the business of either of them prevented such compliance.

The chamber and its members conspired among themselves and with others to boycott and refuse to deal with the Equity, its stockholders or the members of the Exchange and to induce others to so refuse. For more than 10 years, respondents have been engaged in a conspiracy to embarrass and destroy the business of the Equity and its stockholders and of the Exchange and its members, with the purpose of maintaining a monopoly in the grain trade. Such monopoly has been so maintained and has unduly hindered and restrained competition in interstate commerce between the members of the chamber on the one hand and the Equity, its stockholders and members of the Exchange on the other.

Acts in pursuance of the above conspiracy were as follows:

(a) A resolution (No. 405) passed by the chamber in October 1912, falsely charging that nonmembers, in many cases, obtained members to sell grain which was shipped because of false statements and forbidding members from handling grain for nonmembers who solicited grain shipments from farmers or country shippers by false statements concerning the dealings in the chamber or concerning the right of grain shippers with respect thereto or, "unless the person so soliciting such shipment can show a written statement of the shipper to the effect that he realizes that the person receiving such shipment is not a member of the chamber and cannot get advantages out of the chamber which he could not himself get." The purpose and effect of this resolution was to cause expense, delay, and loss of business to such competitors.

(b) A second resolution (No. 634), in January 1916, which was interpreted by the chamber as forbidding its members to act in any manner for the Equity or its stockholders and was so enforced.

(c) Between May 1912, and May 1917, publication of false and misleading statements concerning the financial responsibility and business methods of the Equity, the exchange, their officers and members. These publications and reprints thereof were circulated among patrons and prospective patrons of the above. Certain of these publications attacked the Equity, the exchange, editors who commented favorably on the Equity and country elevators shipping to the Equity; advised directors of country elevators not to interfere with the managers of such in choosing persons and places to which grain should be shipped; pretended to offer expert advice on cooperative marketing while conducting a campaign against cooperative terminal marketing.

(d) Subsidized the former official organ of an association of farmers (American Society of Equity), which had been affiliated with the Equity, and circulated copies thereof containing articles defamatory to the Equity and in praise of the chamber—such publication carrying the false legend that it was still such official organ.

(e) Publication of false statements concerning "double commissions" charged by Equity, refused to retract same and thereafter reiterated them.

(f) Espionage of the exchange and its transactions. Sent letters to banks, farmers, customers of the Equity and others designed to injure the credit and standing of the Equity with such persons. False or misleading statements concerning loss of profits and double commissions as to grain handled by the Equity.

Although these false, unfair, and misleading publications ceased in 1917, the matter so circulated has been and is still being used by farmers, bankers, shippers, and country elevator officials to the financial injury of the Equity.

(g) For the purpose of destroying the Equity, by having it declared insolvent and a receiver appointed, they instigated and financed the Schmidt suit and induced about 50 members of the chamber to make affidavits to aid in the Linde suit, which was dismissed because the Equity was solvent. Instigated and financed the suit in the U.S. court in bad faith and for the purpose of hindering and obstructing the business of the Equity and of injuring its credit and reputation.

(h) Inquiries and investigations at banks and other financial backers of the Equity and its stockholders for the purpose of creating suspicion concerning them and injury thereto.

These actions caused substantial expense to the Equity; injured its credit and standing with grain shippers and the public and the same result followed the allegation of unfair and dishonest conduct made and published in connection therewith.

Conclusion

"That by reason of the facts set forth above, the respondents and all of them, have committed acts to the prejudice of the public and competitors of respondent chamber and competitors of the members of respondent chamber, and which acts constitute unfair methods of competition in commerce within the intent and meaning of section 5 of an act of Congress entitled 'An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes,' approved September 26, 1914."

Order of Commission

The order was divided into three divisions. The first was directed to all of the respondents and forbade conspiracy for the publication or circulation of any false or misleading statements concerning the financial standing, business or business methods of the Equity, its officers or stockholders, or of the exchange, its officers or members; and for institution of vexatious or unfounded suits against the Equity with the purpose of hindering or obstructing its business or of injuring its credit or reputation.

The second division of the order was directed at the chamber, its directors, officers, members, and representatives and forbade the acts and things following:

"(1) Combining and conspiring among themselves or with others directly or indirectly to induce, persuade or compel and from inducing, persuading or compelling any of the members of said chamber, their agents or employees, to refuse to buy from, sell to, or otherwise deal with the St. Paul Grain Exchange or its members or the Equity Cooperative Exchange, or its stockholders, or the customers or any of them, because of the patronage dividend plan of doing business adopted by the said Equity Cooperative Exchange, or by any of the members of the said St. Paul Grain Exchange as more particularly set forth in paragraph (4) infra of this order.

"(2) Hindering, obstructing or preventing any telegraph company or other distributing agent from furnishing continuous or periodical price quotations of grains to the St. Paul Grain Exchange, or its members, or to the Equity Cooperative Exchange or its stockholders.

"(3) Passing or enforcing any rule or regulations, or enforcing any usage or custom that prohibits or prevents members of the respondent chamber from conducting their business of dealing in grain according to the cooperative method of marketing grain or according to the patronage dividend plan, like or similar to the method or plan adopted by the Equity Cooperative Exchange.

"(4) Denying to any duly accredited representative of any organization or association of farmer grain growers or shippers admission to membership in said respondent chamber, with full and equal privileges enjoyed by any or all of its members or by any or all concerns represented by membership in said respondent chamber of commerce because of the plan or purpose on the part of such organization or association to pay or propose to pay patronage dividends or to operate or propose to operate according to the cooperative plan of marketing grain, namely, the plan of returning any portion or all of its earnings or surplus to its patrons or members on the basis of patronage, whether such earnings or surplus is derived from charging patrons or members commissions or otherwise.

"(5) Passing or enforcing any rule or regulation or enforcing any usage or custom, that compels shippers of grain to Minneapolis, Minn., from country points or from St. Paul, Minn., to pay commission or other charges, unless and until like commissions and charges are paid by shippers of grain to Minneapolis from Omaha, Nebr., or from Kansas City, Mo., or other such favored markets.

"(6) Passing or enforcing any rule or regulation, or enforcing any usage or custom, that prohibits members of the respondent chamber, when buying grain on track at country points from paying therefor more than the market price of similar grain prevailing at that time in the exchange room of the respondent chamber, less freight, commissions and other charges.

"(7) Promulgating, interpreting or enforcing any rule, custom, regulation, or usage in such manner as to require any member of respondent chamber to pay to the farmer, or country, shipper or other person, a price for grain limited to a price equivalent to or identical with the Minneapolis market price, or otherwise limit the exercise of free will and individual independent judgment of any such member as to the price which he shall pay, or which he desires to pay farmers, country shippers, or others for grain on track at country points."

The third division of the order required respondents to report in detail in writing to the Commission, within 60 days of service of the order upon them, the way in which they had complied with the order.

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT, JULY 13, 1926—CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF MINNEAPOLIS ET AL. v. FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, NO. 256

CONCLUSION

Upon the entire order of the Trade Commission presented in this review our determination is as follows:

(1) That we should sustain those portions reading as follows:

"Now, therefore, it is ordered that the respondents: The Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis; C. A. Magnuson, C. M. Case, William Dalrymple, A. C. Andrews, B. F. Benson, W. T. Frasier, H. P. Gallaher, J. B. Gilfillan, Jr., H. S. Helm, Asher Howard, John McLeod, J. H. MacMillan, E. C. Van Dusen, John G. McHugh, and all other members, officers, directors, agents, servants and employees of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, manager publishing company, John H. Adams, and John T. Fleming, and each of them and their or its officers, agents, solicitors, representatives, servants, and employees and all other persons acting under, through, by or in behalf of them or any of them, forever cease and desist:

"From combining and conspiring among themselves or with others, directly or indirectly, to interfere with, or injure, or destroy the business or the reputation of the St. Paul Grain Exchange, or its officers and members, of the Equity Cooperative Exchange, or its officers and stockholders, (or other competitors of the respondent Chamber and its members) by

"(1) Publishing or causing to be published in any newspaper, periodical, pamphlet or otherwise, or circulating, or causing to be circulated orally or otherwise, among the customers or prospective customers of the members of the St. Paul Grain Exchange, or the public generally, any false or misleading statements concerning the financial standing, the business or the business methods of the said Exchange, its officers or members, or concerning the said Equity Cooperative Exchange, its officers or stockholders.

"(2) Instituting vexatious or unfounded suits either at law or in equity against said Equity Cooperative Exchange with the purpose or intent, or with the effect of hindering or obstructing the business of the said Equity Cooperative Exchange or injuring its credit and reputation.

"It is further ordered that the respondents: The Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis; C. A. Magnuson, C. M. Case, William Dalrymple, A. C. Andrews, B. F. Benson, W. T. Frasier, H. P. Gallaher, J. B. Gilfillan, Jr., H. S. Helm, Asher Howard, John McLeod, J. H. MacMillan, F. C. Van Dusen, John G. McHugh, and all other members, officers, directors, agents, servants, and employees of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, and each of them, and their or its officers, agents, solicitors, representatives, servants, and employees and all persons acting under, through, by or in behalf of it or them, or any of them, forever cease and desist from:

"(1) Combining and conspiring among themselves or with others directly or indirectly to induce, persuade or compel and from inducing, persuading or compelling any of the members of said Chamber, their agents or employees, to refuse to buy from, sell to, or otherwise deal with the St. Paul Grain Exchange or its members or the Equity Cooperative Exchange or its stockholders, or the customers or any of them, because of the patronage dividend plan of doing business adopted by the said Equity Cooperative Exchange, or by any of the members of the said St. Paul Grain Exchange, as more particularly set forth in paragraph (4) infra of this order.

"It is further ordered that the respondents: The Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis; C. A. Magnuson, C. M. Case, William Dalrymple, A. C. Andrews, B. F. Benson, W. T. Frasier, H. P. Gallaher, J. B. Gilfillan, Jr., H. S. Helm, Asher Howard, John McLeod, J. M. MacMillan, F. C. Van Dusen, John G. McHugh, manager publishing company, John H. Adams, and John H. Fleming shall within 60 days after the service upon them of a copy of this order, file with the Commission a report in writing setting forth in detail the manner and form in which they have complied with the order to cease and desist heretofore set forth."

EXCERPTS FROM TESTIMONY OF BENJAMIN DRAKE, ATTORNEY

These actions and proceedings involved the exchange in large expense and compelled an outlay for attorneys' fees, witness' fees, court fees and other expenses directly attributable thereto and including the time of officials and employees of the exchange of not less than $20,000. In addition to direct outlay necessitated by this litigation, the credit of the Equity Cooperative Exchange was seriously effected thereby and the confidence of the public generally, and grain shippers in particular, was greatly weakened by the charges and allegations of unfair and dishonest conduct made and published by the plaintiffs in connection with the litigation and proceedings in question.

EXCERPTS OF TESTIMONY OF EDWARD ENGERUD, ATTORNEY

I went to Minneapolis that same week and saw Adams in Minneapolis. At this time, Mr. Adams guaranteed to pay my expenses, I had had no communication from Mr. Schmidt up to this time. When I saw Mr. Adams upon this occasion, I also called upon Mr. McHugh. I met him at the entrance of the pit and we stepped into his office. I was at this time in the office of Mr. Oliver Newhouse, an old college friend of mine. As we were stepping out we met a man who Mr. Newhouse introduced to me as Mr. McHugh. * * * I wanted to see Mr. McHugh because Mr. Newhouse told me that he could give me a good deal of information about the operations of this Equity Cooperative Exchange. Mr. Newhouse is a member of the chamber of commerce. Mr. Newhouse expressed his pleasure that somebody was going after these men (meaning the Equity Cooperative Exchange) and hoped that somebody would get them. I talked the matter over with Mr. Newhouse and he suggested that McHugh was the man to see. He said "the better man for you to see would be McHugh; he could tell you more definitely—give you more information that I could."

* * * * *

I have made arrangements with Mr. Schmidt to the effect that he needn't worry about my fees in this case, Mr. Adams told me—he said if any money is needed he would guarantee that my expenses would be paid. I never had any talk with Mr. Schmidt about fees prior to the time the action was commenced. * * * I got a letter from Adams and saw Adams and found out something about the situation. Then I sent to Schmidt and had him execute a power of attorney. I don't know where the letter is that I got from Adams. I can produce it if it is a proper subject professionally to produce. I don't know about that. If it is, I will produce it but otherwise I won't. It is true that Mr. Adams practically requested me to communicate with Mr. Schmidt. I did not discuss with Mr. Adams the amount of my fees. I assured him that it would not be very much and he assured me that he would guarantee all fees and expenses. You might say that to some extent, I was really prosecuting the action at Adams' request and relying upon his payment of the fees.

I am familiar with the news item which appeared in the Courier News, August 1 concerning the Mattson deposition. Mr. Adams has since told me that he telegraphed that in to the Courier News.

With reference to the reprint of the petition in this proceeding, in the Fargo Forum for the issue of July 24, 1914, I will say that about the 22d or 23d of July, a reporter of the Forum, named Vinnie Hildreth, came to me and wanted an interview. He said that he understood that I was examining the books of the Equity Cooperative Exchange and was going to start proceedings against them and wanted some dope on the matter. I told him that I did not wish to discuss it but said I probably would start proceedings. I then went to the lake and there wrote out the manuscript for the petition and had it transcribed at Detroit. Mr. Wilde of the Forum then called me by telephone. He asked me if I was going to start proceedings and I told him that I was and that I didn't want to talk about it. He said "We want to get it and you might as well let us get it first." I said "You know how to get it, it has to be filed and made a public record." Then I mailed it to my office. My associate Mr. Holt called me up the day after I mailed it from Detroit and said that one of the Forum reporters was at the office and wanted them to let them have a copy and save them the work and delay that would be involved in going to the clerk's office and making a copy. He wanted to know what to do about it and I told them he might as well let them have it; they would get it anyhow. I was called up by Mr. Hold around 11 o'clock in the morning. This was the day after I had mailed the petition to Fargo. It was the 24th, the afternoon of the 24th, that Mr. Holt called me up.

Something like 4,000 of the Courier News for the issue of July 26, 1914, were mailed out from Minneapolis by the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis. A day or two after the issue of the Courier News for Sunday, July 26, our firm received a telegram from one E. S. Hughes naming himself as assistant secretary of the chamber of commerce and requesting us to ascertain the price of a certain number of copies of the Courier News of that date. We inquired of the Courier News what their charge was and I recall it was $30 a thousand and we wired that information to Mr. Hughes and received another telegram asking us to order for them and ship to him 4,000 copies. We communicated the order to the Courier News and I presume that it was filled.

OTHER TESTIMONY

My full name is J. P. Dotson and throughout the year 1914 I resided at Fargo, N. Dak. My business was that of publishing the Fargo Forum. At that time I was principal stockholder of the Forum Publishing Co. and president of the company. The name of the paper which I published was the Fargo Forum and Daily Republican. For the isues of March 3, 1914, and July 24, 1914, we printed approximately 10,000 copies on each of these dates. The secretary of the chamber of commerce solicited me to reprint the issue of July 24, and this was done about 3 days later; 1,000 copies of this issue was sent to the chamber of commerce at Minneapolis. We received $30 and some cents for the 1,000 copies. I do not remember that we sent any copies of the issue of March 3 to the chamber of commerce. I did not authorize free distribution of the issue of July 24 at the State fairgrounds; but some copies may have been given free by our solicitors out there. I am unable to say at what time we received the copy of the petition that is reprinted in the issue of July 24.

Clarence B. May, one of the witnesses in the action brought in the district court, Cass County, N. Dak., wherein Fred Schmidt et al. were plaintiffs and J. M. Anderson et al. were defendants, if called as a witness in this case, would testify as follows, he having already so testified in said action:

"My name is Clarence B. May and I live at Argusville, N. Dak. In the years 1913 and 1914, I was president of the Farmers' Elevator, of Harwood, N. Dak. I lived at Harwood but my mail comes to Argusville and I have lived there for 40 years. In 1914, I was not a subscriber to the Fargo Forum. However, I received through the mails a copy of the Fargo Forum for the issue of July 24, 1914, the same being Commission's exhibit —. This addressed to the president of the Farmers' Elevator, of Harwood. It was not addressed to me personally. There appeared upon this exhibit the imprint of a hand which pointed toward an article entitled 'Sensational Charges Made Against Equity Cooperative Exchange, etc.' The secretary of our elevator company also received one of these exhibits.

"I heard McHugh, the secretary of the chamber of commerce, speak at a meeting held in this assembly hall in Fargo about a year ago. This was at a meeting of elevator men. I called the meeting to order but somebody else presided. On this occasion McHugh said that there wasn't room for only one market and that belonged to Minneapolis. He said that the Equity would either lose out or beat the farmers. He also said that no cooperative institution like the Equity Cooperative Exchange would be admitted to membership in the chamber of commerce."

A. P. Dougan, one of the witnesses in the action brought in the district court, Cass County, N. Dak., wherein Fred Schmidt et al. were plaintiffs and J. M. Anderson et al. were defendants, if called as a witness in this case, would testify as follows, he having already so testified in said action:

"My name is A. P. Dougan, and in 1914 I resided in Fargo, N. Dak. On July 24, 1914, the State fair of North Dakota was in session at Fargo. I was present upon the fairgrounds in Machinery Hall. There was a large crowd present upon the fairgrounds that day, with many farmers and grain growers. The Fargo Forum for the issue of that day, July 24, 1914, being Commission's exhibit—was both sold and given away upon the fairgrounds on that day. They were giving away those that I saw distributed in the building that I was in, Machinery Hall. The usual charge for this paper was 5 cents. One of the copies was given to me. It was given to me by Mr. Hastings, a representative of the Forum. Copies were given to every man in Machinery Hall that had an exhibit, and I also saw them handing them to a few farmers. In the past I have worked for the Fargo Forum, but I never saw the papers given away at any other time. I worked for the Fargo Forum for about 9 months, and I know that it usually comes out for sale upon the streets of Fargo about 4 o'clock in the afternoon."

E. W. Henstrum, if called as a witness in this case, would testify as follows:

"My name is E. W. Henstrum; In 1913 and 1914 I was manager of the Equity elevator at Bremen, N. Dak. I was not at the time a subscriber for either the Fargo Forum or the Daily Courier-News of Fargo. However, as manager of this elevator, I received through the mail a copy of the issue of the Fargo Forum for July 24, 1914. I also received three copies of the Daily Courier-News of Fargo for the issue of August 1, 1914. These three copies were all mailed from Minneapolis and each copy bore the imprint of a finger pointing to the article upon the Equity Cooperative Exchange. I also received a copy of the Courier-News for the issue of July 26, 1914. Also, as manager of the elevator company I received through the mail four rolls of the publication known as the 'History of the Equity Cooperative Exchange.' There were six numbers in each roll, and upon each copy was printed the words 'Distribute Among Directors.' I have never been a subscriber for the Cooperative Manager and Farmer, but during this time I received at least five or six other copies of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer containing articles directed against the Equity Cooperative Exchange."

N. E. Nelson, one of the witnesses in the action brought in the District Court, Cass County, N. Dak., wherein Fred Schmidt et al. were plaintiffs and J. M. Anderson et al. were defendants, if called as a witness in this case, would testify as follows, he having already so testified in said action:

"My name is N. E. Nelson. I am a retired farmer and reside at Fargo, N. Dak., and have so resided for the past 8 years. On the afternoon of July 24, 1914, I was present at the fairgrounds near Fargo, N. Dak. I saw an issue of the Fargo Forum of that day containing the article upon the Equity Cooperative Exchange distributed in large numbers."

C. J. Solberg, one of the witnesses in the action brought in the district court, Cass County, N. Dak., wherein Fred Schmidt et al. were plaintiffs and J. M. Anderson et al. were defendants, if called as a witness in this case, would testify as follows, he having already so testified in said action:

"My name is C. J. Solberg, and I have resided for the past 8 years at Wild Rice, N. Dak. I am the secretary of the Farmers' Elevator at that place. Copies of the Fargo Forum for the issue of July 24, 1914, and of the Courier News for July 26, 1914, were mailed to our elevator company. The imprint of a hand or finger upon each paper directed attention to the article upon the Equity Cooperative Exchange. The papers were mailed from Minneapolis. I was not a subscriber for either of these papers at the time. We received these papers by mail. I did not count them but there was a whole bundle of them. They were addressed to the secretary of the Farmers' Elevator & Trading Co., Wild Rice, N. Dak. Our elevator company also received other copies of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer. I was not a subscriber for this magazine and our elevator company was not a subscriber for it at the time."

Mr. FLANNERY. I ask that the following paper be marked for identification "Commission's Exhibit 70," the same purporting to be a copy of the complaint filed in the District Court, Third Judicial District, entitled "The State of North Dakota, ex rel, Henry J. Linde, Attorney General, plaintiff, vs. Equity Cooperative Exchange et al., Defendants," the same consisting of 33 pages.

* * * * *

I ask that the following issues of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer be marked for identification, as follows:

The issue of April 1913 as "Commission's Exhibit 73."

The issue of May 1913 as "Commission's Exhibit 74."

The issue of June 1913 as "Commission's Exhibit 75."

The issue of July 1913 as "Commission's Exhibit 76."

The issue of August 1913 as "Commission's Exhibit 77."

* * * * *

Benjamin Drake, if called as a witness, would testify as follows:

"I was present at a meeting of the State Elevator Association of South Dakota, held at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., on or about December 15, 16, 17, and 18, 1913.

"There were present at this meeting at least 200 farmers, grain growers and grain men, including representatives and delegates from at least 25 farmers and independent elevators.

"John G. McHugh, secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, appeared at that meeting and addressed the audience for at least half an hour. Among other statements made, he repeatedly stated that the Equity Cooperative Exchange was not an honest marketing agency; that practically all the buyers of grain at Minneapolis were members of the chamber of commerce; that the Equity Cooperative Exchange was unable to sell the grain for its full market value or for a price equal to that which could be obtained by members of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis; that the exchange was practically an insolvent institution, and that he advised all grain growers to ship their grain to reputable commission men who were members of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and not risk shipping grain to the Equity Cooperative Exchange. E. P. Wells, then president of the respondent chamber, and B. F. Benson, a member thereof, both addressed this meeting and solicited shipment of grain to chamber members.

"About 10 days or 2 weeks previous to the meeting at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., described above, I was present at a meeting of the stockholders of a farmers elevator company located at Madison, Minn. There were at least 25 stockholders of the company present, and at least 75 farmers and grain growers in addition thereto, in the audience.

"Mr. McHugh appeared at this meeting and made all of the statements which I have set forth above as made at the meeting held at Sioux Falls, S. Dak. In addition to the statement already described, he stated at this meeting, that it grieved him to see the farmers taken in and defrauded by a 'fake' grain concern such as the Equity Cooperative Exchange.

"I was present at a meeting of the State Elevator Association held at Fargo, N. Dak., July 2 and 3, 1913. There were representatives present at this meeting from at least a dozen farmers elevators, and an audience composed of farmers, grain growers, and citizens generally, of not less than 150 people.

"Mr. McHugh appeared at this meeting, and made, in substance, all of the statements set forth above as made at the meeting held at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., and repeatedly requested the farmers and grain growers present to consign all of their grain to members of Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, and Duluth Board of Trade."

C. U. Somers, Fargo Equity Co-op Exchange:

"That in interviewing managers, directors and stockholders of elevators, as aforesaid, during the past 4 years on not less than one hundred occasions, the persons interviewed have produced copies of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer—the so-called History of the Equity Cooperative Exchange, Commission's Exhibit —; the so-called Equity Cooperative Exchange Question Book, Commission's Exhibit and other similar published articles reflecting upon said exchange, and have cited the same as reasons for refusing shipments of grain to said exchange. That during the past year on not less than ten occasions said publications were so exhibited and cited in support of refusals to consider shipment of grain to said exchange. That on many hundred other occasions during said interviews the charges and statements contained in said publications have been quoted or referred to by the said persons interviewed. That during said 4 years at least 25 bankers and bank cashiers have gone to their files and exhibited to me some one of the publications referred to above, and read or quoted statements therefrom, and that many bankers have referred to the same at said interviews without producing them. That during the past year at least two bankers have exhibited and quoted some one of said publications to me, and at least four others have referred to or quoted one thereof without producing the same. That during the past 4 years at least 25 newspaper editors have produced one or more of said publications from their files or newspaper morgues when I called to interview them."

EXHIBIT 3

SENSATIONAL CHARGES MADE AGAINST EQUITY EXCHANGE ALLEGE STOCK IS IMPAIRED—DIRECT CHARGE IS MADE THAT FALSE STATEMENT WAS ISSUED BY CONCERN—CLAIMED THAT BOOKS HAVE BEEN IMPROPERLY KEPT AND MANDAMUS PROCEEDINGS BEGUN TO COMPEL CONCERN TO SHOW ITS BOOKS IN POLLOCK'S COURT—ALLEGED THE BOOKS SHOW LOFTUS WAS TO GET ONE-HALF OF GROSS EARNINGS OF MINNEAPOLIS OFFICE—ALLEGED BOOKS DO NOT SHOW ALL ACTUAL EXPENSES—MUST PRODUCE BOOKS

This forenoon Judge Pollock signed the petition and ordered the Equity Cooperative exchange to produce its books on August 5.

Revealing an astounding condition of affairs and alleging that the Equity Cooperative exchange has not only impaired its stock to the extent of $8,670, but that the society under its present management has each year suffered a deficit instead of making a profit, that the assets of the corporation have been uselessly wasted and that books have been improperly kept, a writ of mandamus was filed this morning with the clerk of court in Cass County by Engerud, Holt & Frame and J. M. Witherow, attorneys for the petitioners, Fred Schmidt and Greenfield and Crumpton. Schmidt, Greenfield and Crumpton are each shareholders in the Equity exchange.

Judge Engerud is out of the city and no statement could be obtained from him or from his office regarding the suit but it appears from the petition that the object of the organization was to furnish a means of marketing grain for the grain producers of the Northwest at a reduced cost and from the statement filed it appears that instead of this result the assets of the corporation have been wasted and as present conducted it can never attain the object for which it was obstensibly organized.

As J. M. Anderson, president of the corporation has refused to allow the books to be examined by the petitioners, they bring this writ to compel such books and papers to be produced for examination.

EQUITY EXCHANGE, LOFTUS, AND ANDERSON SUED IN HENNEPIN COUNTY COURT FOR $20,000—OFFICERS OF WELL-KNOWN GRAIN COMMISSION HOUSE CHARGED WITH VIOLATION OF CONTRACT, MISMANAGEMENT, AND POLITICAL ACTIVITY—LOCAL SUIT EXCITES MUCH INTEREST AMONG FARMER STOCKHOLDERS IN THE CONCERN—WALTER THOMSON, LOCAL EXPERT ACCOUNTANT, REPUDIATES ALLEGED STATEMENT BY HIM—HAS NOT SEEN FIRM'S BOOKS SINCE 1912

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 25.—The Equity Exchange, which is to transfer its local office from Minneapolis to St. Paul next month, is defendant in simultaneous suits filed yesterday in Minneapolis and Fargo, N. Dak. Violation of contract, mismanagement, and political activity are among the allegations in the local suit, the last two allegations are duplicated in the other suit.

In addition to the exchange, George S. Loftus, sales manager, J. M. Anderson, president, and Mathew A. Sauter are made defendants by the commission firm of Greenfield & Crumpton, of Superior, Wis. It is alleged that the three entered into a conspiracy against the firm after it had become a member of the exchange and had signed a contract by which it was given the head of the lakes as exclusive territory.

Sauter, it is said, left the employment of the plaintiff and took with him the stenographers, business methods, and plan of operation, together with $1,871.43 of the firm's funds, with which offices were established to which the railroads were told to assign the incoming grain. Twenty thousand dollars damage is asked for this alleged violation of contract.

Will the Equity Cooperative Exchange go into the hands of a receiver?

OFFICERS DECLARE IT IS BIG BUSINESS

The officers of the society say there is nothing crooked and that the organization is solvent; that the application to court is only a part of a plan to discredit them, and that the allegations concerning the books will be showed up when the time comes. In a statement made to the Courier-News they charge Judge Engerud with being "a venial spy of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce."

G. A. Thiel, secretary-treasurer of the Cooperative Equity Exchange, yesterday denied without exception the reports current in the city for the last several days that the Equity Exchange is either insolvent or that its funds have been misused by the officials.

EXHIBIT 4

DOCKET 694—MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., SEPTEMBER 8, 1922

Met pursuant to adjournment, 10 a.m., before W. W. Sheppard, examiner.

Appearances: M. M. Flannery and Charles Melvin Neff, counsel for the Federal Trade Commission. Lancaster, Simpson, Junell & Dorsey, by David F. Simpson, counsel for respondents. (Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, et al.)

Examiner SHEPPARD. There was no hearing yesterday, September 7, 1922, on account of counsel conferring as to stipulation.

Mr. FLANNERY. I offer in evidence page 39 of the stipulation, if there is no objection, which reads as follows:

"Respondent, J. H. Adams, if called as a witness, would testify as follows:

" 'With reference to Commission's exhibits 37 and 37-A (collection of reprints); Commission's exhibit 38 (question book) and Commission's exhibit 39 (question book) and the publication and distribution thereof that said exhibits 37 and 37-A (collection of reprints) is a collection of certain reprints from articles which were published at various times in the regular issues of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer.

" 'That practically all of the copy and data used in publishing said articles was collected and furnished to the Cooperative Manager & Farmer by the respondent chamber of commerce through its secretary and assistant secretary.

" 'That while he does not recall the exact number of copies of each reprint of said articles which were printed, it is his best recollection that the total number thereof would amount to at least 700,000.

" 'That said reprints were published at the request of and were delivered to and paid for by the respondent chamber of commerce through its secretary and assistant secretary.

" 'That as he had very little to do with the financial end of the business, he cannot state the amount of money which was paid to the Cooperative Manager & Farmer for the printing of said articles and reprints, but he does recall very distinctly that on one occasion the amount paid by the respondent chamber of commerce for some of this work was $5,200.

" 'With reference to the article in second section on pages 43 to 50 of exhibits 37 and 37–A (collection of reprints), which is an article entitled "Equity Cooperative Exchange Question Book," (the same being Commission's exhibit 38 (question book) in its original form), that all of the copy and data were furnished by the secretary of the respondent chamber of commerce.

" 'With reference to Commission's exhibit 39 (picture book) that his recollection was somewhat vague as to the total number of copies of this issue which were published and delivered to the respondent chamber of commerce, its members and others engaged in the grain business, but he is certain that there were at least 20,000; that practically all of the copy and data used in publishing the articles in this issue concerning the Equity Cooperative Exchange were supplied and the same were published in the form and manner requested by the respondent chamber of commerce; that he (Adams) was in favor of publishing the said picture book without referring therein to the Equity Cooperative Exchange, but that the secretary of the respondent chamber of commerce insisted that it be printed in its present form, containing derogatory statements about the said Equity Cooperative Exchange, and its method of transacting business.' "

Mr. FLANNERY. I ask that the following pamphlet be marked for identification, Commission's Exhibit 37, the same purporting to be a collection of reprints from the Cooperative Manager and Farmer.

I also ask that the following pamphlet be marked for identification, "Commission's Exhibit 37–A," the same purporting to be a collection of reprints from the Cooperative Manager and Farmer. These are not dated, but are various reprints. In other words, this matter appeared in the Cooperative Manager and Farmer in various issues and has been compiled in book form.

Examiner SHEPPARD. They are admitted.

Mr. SIMPSON. Exhibits 37 and 37–A are several different reprints bound together, each volume containing, I think, three separate reprints. Each of the reprints contained in the volume was issued at different times and circulated at different times. The earliest reprint was entitled "History of the Equity Cooperative Exchange" and was very generally circulated as a separate reprint in pamphlet form containing about 16 pages, and was reprinted from a publication of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer. Subsequently other reprints were made from articles appearing in the Cooperative Manager and Farmer, and were circulated. The latter part of 1916, for convenience of reference and to keep these reprints together, 50 copies were bound in the form in which they appear as exhibits 37 and 37–A, but the volume as so bound was never circulated. * * *

Mr. FLANNERY. I understand then, that the original articles from which the reprints are made, were circulated; but the collection as it stands was not circulated.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is right.

Mr. FLANNERY. I ask that the following pamphlet be marked for identification, "Commission's Exhibit 38," the same purporting to be pamphlet entitled "Equity Cooperative Exchange Question Book."

I ask that the following pamphlet entitled "Cooperative Manager & Farmer" be marked for identification, "Commission's Exhibit 39," the same purporting to be a special issue of that publication designated as the "picture book."

I offer in evidence Commission's exhibits 37, 37–A, 38, and 39.

Examiner SHEPPARD. Accepted.

Mr. FLANNERY. I offer page 40 of the stipulation in evidence, which reads as follows:

"That he [Adams] tried to convince his associate, the respondent Fleming, and to convince the secretary of the respondent chamber of commerce that it was a mistake to continue these attacks on the Equity Cooperative Exchange, and that he had written out a notice to the effect that the policy of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer in that respect was to be changed, and that he would have published this notice in the next issue of the paper, but his partner procured an injunction from the court enjoining him from carrying out his intention to publish said notice, and that shortly after this he was forced by his said partner to disassociate himself from all connection with the paper."

Mr. FLANNERY. I offer pages 41 and 42 of the stipulation in evidence, which read as follows:

"Julius Rebholz, if called as a witness, would testify as follows:

" 'With reference to Commission's exhibit 38 [Question Book] and various issues of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer and the publication and distribution thereof, that he is a printer and that while he was employed by the Cooperative Manager and Farmer he assisted in the printing of various issues of that paper containing attacks on the Equity Cooperative Exchange, and he also assisted in the printing of Commission's exhibit 38 [Question Book]; that practically all of the copy used in printing the said issues of the Cooperative Manager and Farmer and all of the copy used in printing said Question Book was furnished by the respondent chamber of commerce.

" 'That while acting as an agent of said paper he submitted to the assistant secretary of the respondent chamber of commerce, an estimate of the cost of printing a certain number of copies of said question book; that thereafter said secretary ordered the printing of 3,000 copies of said question book; that said copies were printed and delivered to the respondent chamber of commerce, and a statement of the cost thereof rendered to and said bill was paid by said chamber about the month of February in the year 1917.

" 'That shortly after the publication of said question book and while respondent Fleming, the manager of the Cooperative Manager & Farmer was in Chicago, Mr. Teigen, who was chariman of the committee appointed in 1913 by the Minnesota Legislature for the purpose of investigating grain exchanges, ordered 200 copies of said question book; that he furnished said Teigen with 200 copies, and charged him $20 therefor; that upon respondent Fleming's return from Chicago, he was informed of this transaction and became very angry about it and said he did not want the copies sold in that manner; that the resulting friction between him and Mr. Fleming caused him to leave the employ of the paper.' "

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in accordance with the previous order, I move that the Senate stand adjourned until Thursday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until Thursday, February 19, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate February 17, 1959:

U.S. CIRCUIT JUDGE

Lester L. Cecil, of Ohio, to be U.S. circuit judge for the sixth circuit, vice Potter Stewart, elevated.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Galatians 6: 2: Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ.

Eternal and ever-blessed God, we beseech Thee in this Brotherhood Week to inspire us with a clear vision of the many high and helpful things that we are privileged to do together for the welfare of one another and all mankind.

Grant that, in none of life's human relationships, we may allow those feelings and attitudes to permeate our character and conduct which are alien and contrary to the spirit of our blessed Lord.

May we be loyal partners with all who are dedicating themselves to the glorious and adventurous task of establishing a social order in which the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man are the ruling principles.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The communication and the accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DESIGNATION OF MEMBER TO READ WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to a special order agreed to on February 16, 1959, the Chair designates the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. MOORE, to read Washington's Farewell Address immediately following the reading of the Journal on February 23, 1959.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Works, I ask unanimous consent that the committee may meet during general debate this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE LATE HONORABLE HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER].

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, for the first time in any session of the Congress since 1937 the name of HERMAN P. EBERHARTER is heard no longer on the rollcall of the House of Representatives.

Our colleague of the 28th District of Pennsylvania answered a higher call on September 9, 1958, in the Arlington, Va., hospital at the age of 66—and we who knew him so well miss him sorely today.

His friendliness and his devotion to his duties were his two outstanding characteristics. His gentleness and kindly consideration was always for the other fellow.

Over the years he attained recognition and high rank on the important Committee on Ways and Means, specializing in legislation on taxes, social security, and reciprocal trade.

A veteran of the First World War, he was a self-made man who earned his way through the Law School of Duquesne University, practiced the profession in his native Pittsburgh and was elected to the Pennsylvania Legislature in 1934. There, as a member of the ways and means committee of the State house of representatives, he received the early training which led to his successful service on the similar committee in this body.

Two years later the voters of his district sent him to Washington and he was reelected to successive terms in the next 10 elections thereafter.

Despite the loss of his beloved wife and helpmate, and the pain and illnesses he suffered toward the close of his career, Mr. EBERHARTER carried on his duties with a fortitude and determination that evoked the praise and admiration of his colleagues.

His sons, Herman P., Jr., and James Jacob Eberharter may well be proud of their father's record and of the high esteem in which his memory is held here.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it is with great humility that I take the floor this afternoon to participate in the eulogies in behalf of the Honorable HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, late Representative from the 28th District of Pennsylvania. As I reflect upon the career of this man and of his contributions during his years as a U.S. Congressman, I realize that it will be an almost impossible task for me to fill his place as the Representative from his district.

Nearly everyone here remembers well Mr. EBERHARTER's career in Washington. Many of you have witnessed some of his dramatic debates on the floor, as he participated in battles for the 21-day rule, or for greater liberality in social security. Many of you saw him a few months ago as, with great courage, he fought the most difficult battle of all. Despite his failing health, he did not spare himself. He continued to make daily trips to the floor. He maintained almost perfect attendance as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. He forced his stricken body far beyond its strength as he finished his last session of Congress.

Mr. EBERHARTER was extremely conscientious about his work on the Committee on Ways and Means and during his later years particularly, his time and thoughts were almost entirely occupied with the problems coming before this committee. The major subjects encompassed in the jurisdiction of the great Committee on Ways and Means were matters close to the heart of Mr. EBERHARTER—taxation, social security, and the Nation's foreign trade policy. He fervently believed in the promotion of freer trade policy and the continuation of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, and as all of you know, he constantly fought against inequities in our tax structure.

Even more than his work in these fields, however, his consistent efforts in behalf of more liberal social security benefits have caused his name to be associated in the minds of many persons with social security legislation. He was elected to Congress only a year after the original law was enacted and as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means he fought vigorously for enactment of each of the amendments to liberalize the Social Security Act.

These are all parts of Mr. EBERHARTER's legislative career which are well known to those of you who knew him in Washington. However, there is another side of his career which is equally impressive—his tireless record of loyalty and attention to the problems of the people of his home district. Perhaps I can give you a picture of Mr. EBERHARTER's service to his constituency which you have not seen.

After I was nominated to run for the vacancy left by Mr. EBERHARTER's death, I campaigned in the 28th District of Pennsylvania and of course met countless people who had known Mr. EBERHARTER during his 11 terms as their Representative. Included among these were the political, industrial, labor, and civic leaders of the community, all of whom spoke of Mr. EBERHARTER with obvious high regard. But I thought the most dramatic testimony to his greatness came not from these important leaders, but from the people of the district. Time after time, these people told me of some great problem, some disaster, which had befallen them. Each of them after exhausting all other resources had finally turned to their Congressman for help. An older woman, with tears in her eyes, would tell me of Mr. EBERHARTER's help with respect to social security which was her sole means of support. A young man would tell me of Mr. EBERHARTER's personal attention and consideration in helping to bring his parents to America from a foreign land. Whether the problem involved a passport to bring together a family scattered between Israel and Pittsburgh, or a son who seemed hopelessly lost in the Armed Forces or whether it meant untangling the problems of someone who had unknowingly become enmeshed in the complex laws of our Federal Government—Mr. EBERHARTER never failed to make every effort to help the people he represented. They remembered it and loved him for it.

The son of an immigrant tailor, Mr. EBERHARTER was of the people and remained true to them throughout his life. Although he worked in this distinguished hall and talked with men of national renown and fame, HERMAN P. EBERHARTER never lost the common touch—he kept his love for and interest in the people he represented.

On the other hand, neither did he fall into the even more serious fault of being preoccupied only with smaller local problems of his district. He was fully capable of maintaining his loyalty to and interest in the problems of the people of his district, and at the same time never forgetting his responsibilities to the Nation at large.

Truly, it presents a great challenge to be elected to fill the vacancy left by HERMAN P. EBERHARTER.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me that I might pay my respects to the memory of our late colleague, HERMAN EBERHARTER. I had the honor and the pleasure of serving with him in legislative halls longer, I believe, than anyone in the Congress. We served together in the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania prior to his coming to Washington where he preceded me as a Member of this House. We were members of many of the same legislative committees and ultimately served together on the important Committee on Ways and Means. We worked together for what we deemed the best interests of our country, and although we probably differed on legislative matters as much as any two Members could, we maintained a close friendship through it all.

HERMAN EBERHARTER was a man of honor. One could always depend upon his word. He was reliable, responsible, and trustworthy, and you knew where he stood at any given time and on any given issue. He was a distinguished Member of this great body. I am pleased to join with his colleagues, and mine, in these moments of respect to his memory.

I would like his two sons to know of the respect and high esteem in which we held their father. To them, and to all others who think of HERMAN with affection on this occasion, I take this opportunity to salute the memory of a man who recognized his duty and who performed it to the best of his ability. His passing is a great loss—not only to his family and friends, but to the Nation, as well.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Those of us who had the pleasure and the opportunity of knowing HERMAN EBERHARTER, each and everyone of us, is a better man or woman because of that fact. HERMAN EBERHARTER exemplified and symbolized the noblest thoughts the human mind could entertain. His whole life, his whole being, his whole action was animated by but one ideal, found in the word "love," love of God and love of neighbor. One could talk for an endless period of time about this great friend of ours and this good man and at the end feel we had not expressed ourselves completely about the fine qualities that he possessed.

To summarize, HERMAN EBERHARTER was one of God's noblemen; he was a great American; he was an outstanding legislator, and he was a loyal friend.

To his loved ones I extend my profound sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to have served on the Committee on Ways and Means with HERMAN EBERHARTER during all of his tenure on the the committee. Through the years, in my opinion, we have always been fortunate to have outstanding men serve on the Committee on Ways and Means. To me, HERMAN EBERHARTER typified all the qualifications embodied in these outstanding men.

He was a man who, as the House well knows, had the courage to fight for his convictions, be they popular or unpopular in the political sense. He never faltered when he thought he was right. And history has proved that with the passage of time, many of the causes which he championed in earlier years eventually came to pass. He was a leader at all times in bettering the situation of the workingman. Many of the present-day provisions in our social security laws, for example, were espoused by HERMAN EBERHARTER, in many cases years in advance to their actual accomplishment.

He was an equally good champion of the workingman in the field of taxation. At the same time, he never lost sight of the fact that our tax laws must be equitable to taxpayers in all walks of life. He continually counseled the committee on fairness and equity in our tax system. He not only was a very thorough technician, he had that quality which some technicians lack, of practicality.

These qualifications are enough in themselves to set an example for those of us who still remain on the committee to emulate; however, coupled with these is a mark which HERMAN EBERHARTER has left just as indelibly on the members of our committee and the Members of the Congress who knew him, and that is his love for humanity. To HERMAN EBERHARTER, every person in all walks of life was equally important. We can all recall numerous instances where Mr. Eberharter not only spent much of his time but sought the help of his colleagues in the cause of his friends, and yes, even strangers, when their cause was just.

He had a warmth in his personality which rubbed off on everyone with whom he came in contact. I have seen him champion the cause of the lowest paid employee to that of the highest placed Government officials. He was a friend that anyone could turn to in time of need and get a sympathetic ear.

His passing left a void in our committee and in the House. His ability, courage, humaneness and integrity will be a source of strength and guidance to us who have known him as long as we serve in the Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, it was with a sincere sense of regret that I learned of the death of our late colleague and my friend, the Honorable HERMAN P. EBERHARTER. I felt a sense of personal loss because he represented the 28th Congressional District of Pittsburgh, which is close to my own district. When I came to Congress in 1944 he was most friendly and helpful to me. During the years, we had many mutual problems in our districts and we worked together in trying to solve them.

He was a man of remarkable intellect and I know that all my colleagues will agree that he had a distinguished career in the House. He was a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee and had acquired a vast knowledge of social security and tax matters. By many, he was considered to be an expert in these fields. Even when during the past years he suffered from partial paralysis and endured considerable pain, he continued with his duties to his constituents. I feel sure that he truly loved his work and found great fulfillment and relaxation in it.

He represented the 28th District of Pennsylvania for 22 years. He was loved by the people he represented and they showed their love for him by returning him to each new Congress with commanding majorities. In his passing, not only our State, but the Nation, has lost an able and conscientious legislator. I have lost a neighbor and friend.

To his two sons, Herman, Jr., and James, who survive him, I extend my sincere sympathy.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND].

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I deem it a privilege to be able to join my colleagues here today in paying tribute to a great man. I came to the Congress at the same time that HERMAN EBERHARTER came here. I learned to know him particularly during the years that we both were serving on the Committee on Ways and Means. Someone has said here that he was devoted to his duties. I can testify to that, and I want to cite but one example; only one. Most of my colleagues recall that HERMAN EBERHARTER during the last 2 or 3 years prior to his death had difficulty getting about because of illness. It was in 1946 when a subcommittee of our Committee on Ways and Means was organized, to look into the question of excise taxes, that most of us felt that HERMAN EBERHARTER should be resting instead of working. At that time our departed colleague, Jere Cooper, who was chairman, thought he was doing HERMAN a favor by not assigning him to a subcommittee. HERMAN was hurt; terribly hurt by that fact. He talked with the chairman and the chairman then assigned him to the excise tax committee of which I was chairman. I can testify here that no man worked harder in that subcommittee than did HERMAN EBERHARTER, despite his illness. Many of us oftentimes said to him that he should take it easy; that if he wanted to attend some of the sessions, at least he should not stay for the full length of the session. But, always he was there. We are going to miss him; in fact, we have missed him in the committee and here on the floor, and I say in all sincerity that this country is a better country because HERMAN EBERHARTER lived.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER].

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I regretfully join with our many colleagues here in paying this beautiful and well-deserved tribute to our late and beloved colleague, HERMAN EBERHARTER. I counted as one of the many privileges that came to me by reason of my membership in this House the opportunity it gave me to meet and learn to know and work with our late and beloved colleague, HERMAN P. EBERHARTER. He was indeed a good man, a sincere, earnest, able and hard-working legislator, who served his people and his Nation well. We will all miss him sorely.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENT].

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, some 25 years ago HERMAN EBERHARTER, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOLLAND], and I were elected to the State legislature in our first legislative endeavor. He served in that legislative body with distinction, contributed to its daily work, and then was elected to the United States Congress. I will say to all of you here that not alone will this body miss him, as his colleagues here, but the people of Pennsylvania will miss the services that he rendered. And, although there has been a very capable and worthwhile Member elected in his place, this man will lack the experience for a few years to render the same type of service. I, for one, am sorry at his passing. I acknowledge to all of you the gratefulness of having served with him both in Harrisburg and in this body. When I first came here he literally took me by the hand and kept me from using some of the energy I was endowed with, to the wrong purpose. I personally shall miss him.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, for 30 years I can recall the pleasant friendship which existed between HERMAN EBERHARTER and myself. We attended the same high school together. We entered politics the same time, and served our first elective office as a member of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

In 1942 I served with him in the Congress of the United States for a short term. When the General Assembly reapportioned the State of Pennsylvania we found ourselves in the same district and I agreed to step aside to avoid our being opponents. When I returned to Congress in 1956, he escorted me down the aisle to take my oath of office.

Our acquaintance was a pleasant one, and our friendship was enduring.

Mr. EBERHARTER served his constituents well. His reelection year after year proved they appreciated the services he rendered. His elections were always won by big majorities.

I am sure that he shall be remembered by many of those who came to him for help and always received that help.

I shall miss him as one who prized his friendship, and shall miss his cheery hello when we met in the hall on our way to and from the sessions of Congress.

To his sons, Herman and Jimmy, I extend my deepest sympathy. They can be happy in the memories of their father. He had many friends, and I am sure all of them carry fond remembrances of him and share their sorrow over their great loss.

May his soul rest in peace.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the demise of HERMAN P. EBERHARTER took from this legislative body a man of acute mind, boundless energy, understanding heart and lovable character. Despite illnesses—illnesses which had struck him down on past occasions—he was present at committee meetings and on the floor of the House whenever it was humanely possible. This devotion to service may have hastened his departure from our material world, but HERMAN EBERHARTER would never have been satisfied to sacrifice duty to country for personal convenience, regardless of the consequences.

I lost a special friend in the death of our beloved colleague from my State of Pennsylvania. Though we were on opposite sides of the aisle in this Capitol Building, we often sat down and worked together on legislation designed to benefit our constituencies and the Nation. I respected HERMAN'S broad knowledge, and I appreciated his advice. He was particularly formidable in his unique ability to anticipate the conclusions of colleagues with whom he shared membership on the Committee on Ways and Means. This analytical advantage made it possible to save considerable time and effort in the preparation and presentation of legislation, just as it was to accrue eventually to the benefit of the general welfare.

I miss HERMAN EBERHARTER. In the years gone by I enjoyed the company of him and his wife, Emma, who went to her reward before him. More recently, I enjoyed those occasions when he and I met while traveling between Washington and Pittsburgh, and whenever else we were able to get together during our busy days on Capitol Hill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, HERMAN EBERHARTER was a man of splendid ability and high character. His work in his lifetime career was outstanding and effective—the country is better for his having passed this way.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I rise in salute and pay a well-deserved tribute to a departed colleague, an outstanding Congressman, and a true and warm friend whose passing into eternal life leaves me torn with mixed feelings—a feeling of anguish in the loss of a true American and a warm, personal friend; and a feeling of joy in the knowledge that HERMAN EBERHARTER, though still hovering about us in spirit, has come truly to a well-merited crown in that greater life beyond the vale of earthly cares.

HERMAN EBERHARTER, whose interest in me, personally, I shall cherish as long as I live, was a real public servant, Mr. Speaker. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, he had the unquestioned confidence of every Member of this legislative body and the fact that he was endeared to the residents of the 29th Pennsylvania Congressional District is evidenced in the fact that he was reelected to represent his home district in Pittsburgh, time and time again, spanning more than a score of years. HERMAN EBERHARTER, Mr. Speaker, first came into these halls as a Member of the 75th Congress, in 1935, and he was elected to every Congress since then, until his death during the 85th Congress. Before that time, he served in the Pennsylvania Legislature. A graduate of Duquesne University Law School, he also was a veteran of the First World War. In every position of trust he was called upon to fill, he, indeed, served faithfully and well. And, he was in very truth, my friend; my counselor and guide; my mentor. He was a man of true humility; an humble citizen, a brilliant legislator, a kindly man and a priceless friend, who will be greatly missed by all who knew him. This House will miss his wise counsel, his wisdom, his adherence to ideals; his great understanding and his fine sense of fairness; and this Nation will miss a great leader, a leader who preferred the role of anonymity rather than that of public acclaim; a man who at all times displayed a great love of country and whose every thought as a Member of this House was for the peace and security of the United States and the perpetuity of the American way of life.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Speaker, HERMAN EBERHARTER was both a close friend and a colleague of mine. I will miss him very much. We both represented different portions of the city of Pittsburgh and worked together for the benefit of our city. HERMAN EBERHARTER was an outstanding member of the Ways and Means Committee and contributed much to the complex and important work of that committee. He served his district exceptionally well and, in my opinion, was a Congressman's Congressman. Today, many of the people that HERMAN EBERHARTER represented in the Pennsylvania Legislature are in my congressional district, and I know how highly he was regarded and respected by them. His departure is a severe loss to the Nation and especially to the people of Pittsburgh. I wish to extend my deepest sympathy to his family.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sadness that I rise to pay respects to the memory of our beloved and esteemed departed colleague, HERMAN EBERHARTER. The Congress, the people of his district, and the whole Nation suffered a great loss upon his passing.

HERMAN EBERHARTER was a man of profound ability, high ideals, and great warmth of heart. These qualities are too rarely found. The Nation can ill afford to lose men of his caliber.

For many years I have served with HERMAN EBERHARTER in the House and as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. I had occasion, therefore, to become intimately aware of those great personal qualities he possessed which we all admired and which we all sought to emulate. I can say with the utmost sincerity that he was a man of rare political and personal courage. Time and again I have watched him take his stand on the basis of principle, regardless of the forces which might be alined on the other side and regardless of what the political consequences to him might be. I saw his great fighting spirit in the face of personal tragedy to recuperate after he was stricken by personal illness. I had the most profound admiration for the enormous resources and courage which he brought to bear in carrying on with his duties, ably and efficiently, to his district, his State, and his Nation, in the face of his personal tragedies.

He was one of my very best friends, an admired and respected colleague, and one in whom I always never hesitated to put the most complete faith and trust. I was saddened by his death, but there is some degree of solace in recalling that our Nation is better for having had his high and dedicated services through the years.

My deepest sympathy and condolences go out to his two fine sons and to others of his surviving family.

Mr. O'BRIEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep sorrow that I learned of the passing of my beloved and esteemed friend and colleague, HERMAN EBERHARTER. I join with every Member of Congress and every person who knew HERMAN as we knew him here in saying that the things which he did and the accomplishments which were his were done from a great and kindly heart.

HERMAN EBERHARTER was one of the grandest, noblest and most honorable gentlemen who has ever graced the floor of the House of Representatives. He was my close personal friend. He had a host of friends in this great body and throughout the Nation. He was always kindly, considerate, and warm in his friendship with others. He gave unstintingly of his time and energy in advice and counsel to other Members who often consulted with him on important decisions.

He was an admired, courageous, and dedicated statesman. Our Nation has indeed suffered a great loss and in these times we can ill afford to lose men of the integrity and caliber of HERMAN EBERHARTER.

My deepest condolences go to his friends and his surviving family.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is always distressing when we lose one of our colleagues from this great body through their passing.

It is, however, much more distressing when one loses a colleague who has been a close, personal friend such as HERMAN EBERHARTER, who was one of my closest and best friends from the time I first entered the House during the 79th Congress.

My late, lamented friend was a gentleman of fine characteristics. He was, as most of you will recall, most kindly and generous in his remarks when he addressed the House on many occasions. He was not given to vindictiveness or a harsh, intemperate choice of language.

He was a most reliable man. When he was asked to undertake a responsible task, he did not leave it to others to accomplish. I know, through my many contacts with him, that he would personally handle the most difficult of assignments despite his ofttimes busy schedule as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The "Dutchman," as he was affectionately called, was an authentic liberal in the truest sense of the term. Even though he was born, reared, educated, and lived most of his lifetime in a large metropolitan area such as Pittsburgh, he knew and thoroughly understood the problems of the smaller urban and rural areas. His sound philosophy of government was reflected in his thinking and in his actions as a Member of this body: The greatest good for the greatest number of our citizens was his yardstick of governmental responsibility.

His death the latter part of last year was indeed a great loss not only to all of us who knew him as a fine, outstanding gentleman, but also to his constituency whom he served in this body so well for many years. I miss him greatly and I am certain many, many Members of the House feel as I do. I extend my condolences to his family in their great personal loss.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, one of the saddest and most melancholy occasions faced by us is the death of one of our dearly beloved, admired, and respected colleagues. When word of HERMAN EBERHARTER's death came to me I could not do anything but reflect upon the many years of our close and warm friendship dating back to our election to the 75th Congress and the many years of his wholly dedicated services to the Nation. He was a statesman of the highest caliber possessing those qualities which in happy combination led to the highest order of dedication to the public interest.

It is needless for me to recount his numerous abilities—one of the keenest legal minds—one of the sharpest parliamentarians—judgment of the highest order—personal warmth and with a kindly sense of humor—qualities which we all aspire to have but which few are blessed with.

I cannot help but reflect on his day-to-day loyalty to his duties as a Member of the Committee on Ways and Means. Despite his physical infirmities resulting from his illness several years ago he invariably was present at all committee meetings and never failed to carefully and judiciously consider in detail all matters of business brought before the committee.

I pay tribute to his memory and extend my deepest sympathy to his two fine sons, Herman, Jr., and Jimmy, to whom he has left a rich heritage.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, the death of HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, of Pennsylvania, was a personal loss to me. I knew him many years in veterans' activities since World War I.

He was a very kind and generous person and loved life itself in its meaning of service to others. His long career in Congress, 22 years, is testimony itself to his success in attracting the confidence of the voters in his community. He was a kind and considerate person who loved people.

As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, his invaluable service and leadership won the respect of his fellow members of the committee. He was always willing and anxious to help a new member with sound and practical advice.

He died as he lived, a man loved and venerated by everyone. It can truly be said that Pennsylvania has lost a loyal son and a true public servant. The Government and the Nation has lost a patriot and statesman. And with our prayers we ask the Almighty to guide him through the heavenly paths of a new life with new hopes and new ambitions to serve again with soulful loyalty.

We of Illinois extend our sincere condolences to his lovely children, whom he adored with fatherly love.

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, Congressman EBERHARTER was a courageous political leader—a man who had strong convictions and the willingness to support his convictions despite bitter opposition. My husband, who knew him much better than I, having served with Mr. EBERHARTER over a period of 10 years, admired the political courage of the late Mr. EBERHARTER and spoke often of the fact that our laws are as good as they are only because men like Congressman EBERHARTER will battle unceasingly for what they believe is right.

As a new Member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania a few years ago, I came to appreciate the kindliness—the friendliness—of Mr. EBERHARTER, who helped me in many ways to become familiar with my work and was most gracious in helping to obtain comittee assignments which I desired. There are many other Members of Congress who will always remember him and be grateful for what he did for them during his many years of service in the House.

Mrs. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, all of us who served in the House of Representatives with the late Congressman HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, of Pennsylvania, will remember him always as a dedicated public official and as one of the hardest working and best informed members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

On technical legislation involving taxes, reciprocal trade, tariffs and customs, social security, and all of the other vital issues originating in that important committee, many of us—I know I did—automatically turned to Congressman EBERHARTER for information and guidance. He knew the facts, and his instincts were invariably in favor of the public interests in all of these monumental issues of national policy.

His work on technical provisions of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 was inspiring, and he lived to see his judgment vindicated on many of the controversial provisions which he opposed in that little-understood, 1,000-page bill.

I became well acquainted with Congressman EBERHARTER and his beloved wife, Emma, as a result of my close friendship with the late Congresswoman Vera Buchanan, who represented a district adjoining Mr. EBERHARTER's in the Pittsburgh area and whose office was next door to Mr. EBERHARTER's. The four of us shared many, many pleasant hours together in Washington.

Only an inner strength of great magnitude could have kept Mr. EBERHARTER going as he did following Mrs. Eberharter's tragic death a few years ago and his own series of serious illnesses. Yet he persevered and was conscientious in the performance of his duties, and was, despite his personal problems, a man of immense sympathy for the troubles of others. The word heard most often to characterize HERMAN EBERHARTER among fellow workers on Capitol Hill following his death was "kindly."

To the two young men who are the sons of HERMAN and Emma EBERHARTER, Herman P., Jr., and Jimmy, I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that they have a truly fine heritage which I know will help them to face whatever life brings them with the courage which characterized their parents' fearless outlook on life.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the life and accomplishments of our late colleague, Mr. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER; and that when we adjourn today we adjourn out of respect to the memory of our late colleague.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. KEOGH). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House, and especially the Members of the Pennsylvania delegation, were immeasurably saddened when we heard of the untimely passing of our distinguished colleague from Pittsburgh. We paused in that sad hour and recalled his long years of service in this body and the outstanding contribution he had made in our unending quest for a solution to the tax problems confronting our Nation.

The fact remains, however, that our estimate of a colleague's work in most cases rests on our day-by-day observation and how he conducts himself when on the legislation firing line. In HERMAN EBERHARTER'S case, the highest accolade we can award him is to point out that never, even under the most severe provocation, was he observed to desert the role of gentleman which he played to the last.

His latter years in the public service were made doubly arduous due to the loss of his helpmate, who preceded him in death, and his own physical impairment. It can be said of this lovable colleague, however, that he accepted these burdens with a light heart and a cheerful mien, and no one can recall meeting him without receiving a cordial greeting and the firm handclasp of friendship.

Our heartfelt sympathy goes out to the members of his family who are left to mourn his passing, and it is our prayerful hope that they will be comforted by the assurance that we, his colleagues, mourn with them and for them.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of great sadness that I join here in the House in paying a well-deserved tribute to our departed colleague and friend, the Honorable HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, who at the time of his passing on September 9, 1958, represented the 28th District of Pennsylvania.

When I came to Congress in June 1944 HERMAN EBERHARTER was most kind and helpful to me. During the years we served together we found that we had much in common and worked together in seeking solutions to many legislative problems in which we shared an interest.

HERMAN was an outstanding Member of the House and of the Ways and Means Committee. He made substantial contributions to and sponsored much important legislation beneficial to the welfare of the people he represented in his district, his State, and our country. He was a man possessed of great political wisdom and personal courage. I considered him one of my close friends in this body and one in whom I had great faith and trust. I miss him greatly and I am sure that his colleagues on both sides of the aisle share these sentiments.

His sons, Herman P., Jr., and James Jacob Eberharter, have every reason to be proud of their father's illustrious career and his humanitarian principles. They have my deepest sympathy in their great loss.

His memory is as dear today
As in the hour he passed away.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, once I read a short and not very well written bit of verse by an unknown author. Despite its grammatical shortcomings, the message it carries is most evident. It reads:

A man of greatness is he
Who lives to serve his neighbor.
No matter how tough the going may be
He continues to give his best.

I knew the late Hon. Herman P. Eberharter, Representative from the 28th District of Pennsylvania, well and intimately throughout the period of my service in Congress. Somehow I feel that a little bit of verse could well be applied to him.

Its simple words by no means define the many contributions to mankind that Herman Eberharter gave through his untiring devotion to his duty and through his effective and capable leadership. He was solid, sound and substantial. His death is indeed a great loss to all of us and I join with his friends in expressing the deepest regrets to his family. I take comfort, however, in the fact that his accomplishments during his lifetime and his fine spirit will be remembered as an example for others to follow.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES THAT HURT OUR OWN ECONOMY

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, some programs of the U.S. Government bite the hands that feed them. The supreme irony is that American corporations and American workers must pay heavy taxes that are sometimes used to undermine the economic interests of American corporations and American workers. Not deliberately, mind you, but the effect is just the same.

How anyone can possibly defend this is beyond the understanding of most Americans. Not that the peoples of other nations understand it either, but as long as they profit by it, why should they bother to solve this mystery.

Let us give ourselves the worst of the argument, for a starter. So we had to help other nations get back on their feet, after the devastation and dislocation of World War II in order that their weakened economies and despairing people would not be taken over by communism.

But Switzerland has always been a prosperous country, and was not involved in World War II or World War I, or any other war for the past hundred years, or is it longer? There was never any reason why the Government of the United States should give any direct economic aid to Switzerland for the simple reason that she was in no need of it, having, incidentally, taken most of our domestic market away from American watch manufacturers. But we insisted on helping her anyway and indirectly.

It works this way. The Rural Electrification Administration loans money to an American group in order to promote electrical development. This group needs three 22,000-kilowatt turbine-generator sets. Instead of buying this equipment in America the group seeks bids from foreign concerns and places the order with the Brown-Boveri Co., of Switzerland, because that company's price, even after adding 15 percent import duty, was some 25 percent below that of General Electric and other American manufacturers.

If the administration continues with these strange policies that boomerang to the detriment of American industries and American workers we shall be very successful in defeating ourselves.

This cannot be our reasonable purpose. Surely no one in this country wants more depressed areas.

One year's work for 150 people at General Electric has been lost because the Government did not insist that the REA loan must be used to buy American equipment where such equipment is available and clearly superior.

Who goofed on this?

Congress is losing its patience with such strange goings-on.

How about an investigation to make sure that this blunder, to put it kindly, is not followed by similar blunders that are hurting our own economy?

HOME RULE LEGISLATION

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to return to the people of Washington the right of self-government that was taken away from them 79 years ago. The bill I am introducing today has the support of the administration. It is sponsored in the other House by the chairman of the Senate District Committee, Senator BIBLE, of Nevada. It has had the benefit of the best possible skill and experience in its drafting, it was exhaustively studied in the other body and was overwhelmingly approved there last year.

I am convinced that this is sound and workable legislation. I believe that there are two interests, two rights to be protected in legislating on this issue—the interest of the people of the United States in their Nation's Capital and that of the people of Washington in their own local community. This bill gives reasonable recognition to both interests.

I know that some of my colleagues here today will explain fully and well the stake that the people of the District have in this legislation. But I should like, for a moment, to emphasize why all Americans should take an interest and a responsibility for restoring local self-government to the Nation's Capital.

Mr. Speaker, we are justly proud of America's position in the world as "the schoolhouse of democracy." Our Nation's Capital should be the symbol and the living example of our faith in democracy. Nothing is more central to the tradition of American democracy than the right of Americans to conduct their own local affairs. Yet our National Capital is today a flagrant denial of that basic principle. I believe that this affects all of us. Every American should feel concern that here, in our Capital, we present to the world such an example. Washington today is a living example of taxation without representation; of rule by outsiders over a voteless community; of Federal domination of local affairs; of Federal control over local schools. Is that what we believe in? Is that what we want the example of our Capital to teach foreign visitors about the meaning of the American tradition of local self-government? I do not believe it is.

The condition of Washington today brands us as hypocrites in the profession of our own political beliefs. It serves notice that, in the very citadel of American democracy, we do not practice what we preach. More important than what others may think of us is what we think of ourselves and what we think of our Nation's Capital. If we really believe in our own creed and tradition, and if we want to be proud of Washington as a symbol of our American creed, then I cannot see how we can any longer deny the restoration of local democracy to the District of Columbia.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY ASSOCIATION ENDORSES BANK STABILIZATION LEGISLATION ON MISSOURI RIVER SOUTH OF YANKTON, S. DAK.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, during the closing weeks of the last Congress I introduced legislation, along with my South Dakota colleague, Senator CASE, providing for stabilization of the Missouri River bank in the area south of Gavins Point Dam near Yankton, S. Dak., to Ponca, Nebr. It is essential that this legislation be approved to save the homes and farms of many citizens living in this important farming area. I am pleased that the Mississippi Valley Association has strongly endorsed the legislation which I have again introduced in the present Congress, H.R. 1020. The association's stand on this urgent problem is reported in the Sioux City Journal for February 14, 1959, which I include at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

VALLEY GROUP BACKS BANK STABILIZATION ON MISSOURI—PONCA-YANKTON PROJECT GAINS WIDE SUPPORT

OMAHA.—Strong support for legislation authorizing a bank stabilization project on the Missouri River between Ponca, Nebr., and Gavins Point Dam near Yankton, S. Dak., has been promised by the Mississippi Valley Association.

Identical bills for the project have been introduced in the Senate by Senator FRANCIS CASE and in the House of Representatives by Congressman GEORGE MCGOVERN, both of South Dakota.

The Mississippi Valley Association statement came from James R. Smith, vice president of the organization in Omaha. He pointed out that the association's platform, adopted last week in St. Louis, includes a strong statement asking for bank stabilization on unimproved sections of the river between Sioux City and Yankton.

This legislation, Mr. Smith said, is virtually identical to valley association platform statements the last several years. The need for such a project, he said, is obvious to people living in the area.

"Anyone seeing, as I did, homes, buildings, and thousands of acres of fertile bottom land literally falling into the Missouri River due to bank erosion, would realize the utter necessity of preventing the recurrence of such tragedies," Mr. Smith said.

NEW INDUSTRIAL OPPORTUNITIES FOR AMERICAN INDIANS

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, delegates to the annual meeting of the Governors' Interstate Indian Council, held in St. Paul, Minn., October 9 to 11, 1958, unanimously approved a resolution designed to encourage industrial development on or near Indian reservations.

As the author of House Concurrent Resolution 40, calling for a greater development of the economic and social resources of American Indians, I am happy to call the Governors' resolution to the attention of my colleagues, and I include it at this point:

RESOLUTION 13

Whereas the Bureau of Indian Affairs has inaugurated a most commendable and practical program, which has for its purpose an effort to induce private industry to locate plants, for the assembly or fabrication of products, on or adjacent to Indian reservations, for the purpose of utilizing natural resources and providing employment for Indian people on these reservations; and said Bureau has been successful in accomplishing this objective in some measure, which is gratifying and encouraging; and

Whereas there has recently been discovered, in unexpected localities, new natural resources, metals and other products, which are not only important to our national defenses, but which are useful in modern industry; and

Whereas no exploratory survey of Indian reservations has been made by a qualified organization of industrial engineers, for the purpose of discovering new natural resources, and the promotion thereof, or extensive studies to determine new uses for those natural resources now known to exist on said reservations; and

Whereas the increase in Indian populations on reservations and the projected growth of number of Indian peoples on said reservations, within a relatively short period of time, now makes it imperative that some provisions be made whereby more opportunities for employment for Indian peoples, on a practical and realistic basis, now and in the future: Be it therefore

Resolved by the Governors' Interstate Indian Council in session at St. Paul, Minn., on the 9th, 10th, and 11th days of October 1958, Do hereby recommend that the Bureau of Indian Affairs continue in its efforts to induce private industries to locate on or adjacent to Indian reservations; and be it further

Resolved, That this council recommends that the Congress authorize the said Bureau to employ a qualified and equipped firm of industrial engineers, in whom industries have confidence, to explore and to discover what undisclosed natural resources may be present on Indian reservations, and to determine to what use such resources may be put by industries, together with costs of producing or preparing such resources in marketable form, what facilities are available which are requisites to the use thereof; and to compile full reports on their findings, for the purpose of promoting and exploiting said resources; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress appropriate the sum of $1 million, to be specifically used for the employment of a qualified firm of industrial engineers to complete such surveys and explorations, together with reports thereof, as indicated herein.

PRESERVING WILDLIFE AND RECREATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES IN THE MISSOURI RIVER BASIN

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, the people of South Dakota, as well as other Missouri Basin States, have benefited greatly from the Missouri River development program. We expect even greater benefits in the years ahead. One valuable byproduct of river development is the recreational opportunities which stem from the creation of reservoirs behind the large Federal dams.

It is important, if full recreational and wildlife benefits are to be achieved, that the river development program be conducted properly. This includes the replacement of water levels in public lakes near the Missouri River as a substitute for waterfowl breeding areas which would otherwise be lost because of the river installation. There is also a need for reforestation projects near the Missouri River installations.

Recognizing these urgent needs, State Senators Henry Knudsen and E. F. Fredricksen have introduced in the South Dakota State Legislature Senate Concurrent Resolution 2, calling upon the Congress to take whatever action is necessary to replace the facilities lost to the people of South Dakota through the flooding of Missouri River lands. This resolution was forwarded to me by Lt. Gov. John F. Lindley, of South Dakota.

I am today introducing legislation which amends the Flood Control Act of 1944 to provide for improvement of conservation and development of fish and wildlife resources in the Missouri River Basin. I include at this point in the RECORD a copy of my proposed bill, Mr.

Lindley's letter, and the resolution by Senators Knudsen and Fredricksen:

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
SENATE CHAMBER,
Pierre, February 11, 1959.

Hon. GEORGE S. MCGOVERN,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCGOVERN: Enclosed herewith please find a copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 2 which has passed the Senate of South Dakota and the House of Representatives. I believe that the resolution is self-explanatory. This is a serious problem for the State of South Dakota. Although the people of this State benefit, along with people of other States and the Nation as a whole, from these dams they do not benefit directly with any navigation. As far as flood control is concerned, while floods are controlled downriver it means a state of perpetual flood for this area although the dropping of the water level in the dams during the summer and fall of the years for the benefit of downstream navigation causes a very bad condition from the recreational, scenic, health, and other standpoints to the people of this State.

At the time the engineers came through this State selling us on this program they painted a glowing picture of what would result to us in the way of recreational areas as a result of the development of the system. The loss of wildlife cover has been and will be extreme, and to date there has been little or no replacement. Picnic and recreational areas have not been replaced, and monetary considerations arrived at in the case of some public facilities along the river were found to be grossly inadequate when replacement facilities were built. All these were matters that should have been within the knowledge of the engineers and to a great extent were not within the knowledge of the people with whom they were dealing. The flights of waterfowl would appear to be effected to our detriment, and some of the replacements recommended can and should be made. We trust that this will meet with sympathetic consideration from all of you and that either administrative steps or legislative, if found necessary, be promptly taken.

Respectfully yours,
JOHN F. LINDLEY,
Lieutenant Governor, President of the Senate.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 2

(Introduced by Mr. Knudsen and Mr. Fredricksen)

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States and His Excellency, the President of the United States, to take action regarding the replacement of facilities lost to the people of South Dakota through flooding of Missouri River lowlands

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring therein):

Whereas the established Federal policies as set forth by the Congress of the United States require the replacement of public facilities lost through the development of Federal projects; and

Whereas the Missouri River development in South Dakota has taken or will take all of the timber and wildlife cover that formerly existed along the Missouri River; and

Whereas this deprives wildlife of cover and the people of this area from picnic and recreational areas which have not been replaced; and

Whereas many points of historical interest are flooded and lost which cannot be replaced; and

Whereas the promises of the U.S. Corps of Engineers were that such development would increase recreational and related opportunities; and

Whereas the Federal program to date on reforestation and development of recreational facilities and approach roads has been totally inadequate; and

Whereas any such replacement is beyond the capacity of the State of South Dakota: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the 36th session of South Dakota Legislature, the House of Representatives concurring, do memorialize the Congress of the United States and the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Army, to take prompt steps to establish pumping stations and to provide a water level in public lakes near the Missouri River Basin as a replacement for resting places for ducks and geese; and to provide for reforestation projects at and near the headwaters of the tributaries to the Missouri River system including the establishment of small stationary level bodies of water so that trees may flourish and provide some replacement for the loss of cover for wildlife because of the flooding of the Missour River lowlands and to in other ways develop the recreational possibilties as promised, and to provide access thereto; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Army of the United States, to U.S. Senator KARL E. MUNDT, to U.S. Senator FRANCIS CASE, to Congressman E. Y. BERRY, to Congressman GEORGE S. MCGOVERN, and to the Presiding Officers of both Houses of Congress.

JOHN F. LINDLEY,
Lieutenant Governor.
D. H. HOLLAND,
Secretary of the Senate.
ARCHIE GUBBRUD,
Speaker of the House.
W. J. MATSON,
Chief Clerk.

Section 9 of the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 887, 891), is hereby amended by the addition of the following subsection:

"(f) The Secretaries of the Army and the Interior are hereby authorized and directed to provide, through the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation, works of improvement for conservation and development of fish and wildlife resources in the Missouri River Basin. These works of improvement may or may not be physically associated with project works being developed by these agencies for other purposes. The planning and construction of these works of improvement for fish and wildlife resources shall be undertaken in accordance with the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act (48 Stat. 401)."

COAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, several Members of this body have introduced bills to establish a Coal Research and Development Commission to encourage and stimulate the production and conservation of coal in the United States. As a Representative from one of the largest bituminous coal-producing areas in the country, I want to join as a cosponsor of this legislation, which has bipartisan support in both the House and the Senate.

The need for an immediate and long-range research and development program in coal has been apparent to those of us concerned with the economy of the coal-producing areas of the Nation. The coal industry is one industry in which research into all the various aspects of the industry is lagging and at the same time is one where the need is the greatest.

We have in the United States the greatest and most efficient coal industry in the world. Noteworthy advances have been made during the past years. The cutting machine and hydraulically controlled loading machines have now replaced the pick and shovel. Methods of extracting coal from the ground have also improved. Working conditions have improved through the introduction of roof bolting, rock dusting, better lighting facilities, and more adequate ventilating systems. With these improvements, however, there is still much research to be done by the scientist and the engineer for the welfare of the miner and the conservation of this vital national resource.

Research should be conducted into mining production, handling, marketing, distribution, transportation, and conventional and new uses for coal. Of equal importance is research into the synthetic liquid fuels program. There are many new formulas for the production of synthetic fuels from coal and oil shale and for the coking of anthracite and bituminous coals, which if properly pursued might make this country independent of foreign sources of supply.

Mr. Speaker, I believe we have only scratched the surface in new uses for coal. Every effort should be made in the field of coal chemistry in developing a method to efficiently and economically secure oil and gas from coal and in the development of other byproducts that are not now in existence. A research program into coal for conventional uses will be helpful in regaining lost markets and attracting new customers.

Coal research is extremely important, not only to the coal industry, and the communities and States in which coal is mined, but is important to national defense and to the economy of the country. A research program as called for in this legislation brightens the whole future of the coal industry and the future of the producers, the employees and many other people who depend on coal to sustain their economy.

I believe the establishment of this Commission should contribute greatly to the coal industry and to the Nation in building for the future. I hope that the legislation will receive speedy consideration by both the House and the Senate.

ELIMINATION OF AUTOMOBILE EXCISE TAX

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, some have called me the automobile horn of the Congress.

While this title may not have been given to me by admirers of either the automobile or myself, I really do not mind having the title. In fact, I consider it a compliment and might as well let my colleagues know that I will be back with longer and louder blasts as the session wears on.

My horn-honking right now has to do with something which recently happened in the city of Flint, Mich.

The city council has gone all-out for H.R. 2388, a bill which I introduced asking for the elimination of the highly discriminatory 10-percent automobile excise tax.

They have adopted a resolution which I shall include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

I ask this because the automobile industry is not part of the American economy. It is the American economy.

The prosperity and employment of the people of the cities of Flint and Lansing, in the Sixth District of Michigan, as well as of 259 of the 436 congressional districts which contain automobile plants, are vitally affected by this tax. In addition, every district of the 436 is indirectly affected in an adverse manner by this tax.

With growing unemployment in our district and elsewhere, I am certain I will be back to honk the automobile horn again. This is only the beginning—the others will be longer, louder, and loaded with facts about how the many-tentacled automobile industry and its workers are being discriminated against and depressed by the tax pattern of our Federal Government.

Whereas the automobile industry is the most important factor to the economy of this Nation and is especially important to the economy of the city of Flint; and

Whereas this industry provides employment for the vast majority of the Flint labor force; and

Whereas the health of this industry has a direct bearing on all segments of the population of this Nation and of this city; and

Whereas the present excise tax of 10 percent on automobiles is a discriminatory tax against the automobile industry and is a deterrent to sales of this product; and

Whereas this sales handicap consequently adversely affects the health of the automobile industry, reduces the employment of our labor force and impedes the national and local economy; and

Whereas H.R. 2388 is a bill introduced January 15, 1959, in the House of Representatives which would eliminate this discriminatory tax: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this city commission do, and does hereby, go on record as favoring passage of H.R. 2388 in order that the national and local economy and employment situation may be benefited by placing the automobile industry on an equal footing in the marketplace with other manufacturing industries; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be submitted to our Federal legislative representatives and to the governing bodies of other cities in the Nation whose economy is dependent upon the health of the automobile industry.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, today there is a press report on the ticker which reads:

SAN JUAN, P.R.—The high command of the AFL–CIO was reported today to be considering the idea of sending "shock troops" to Washington to dramatize the plight of nearly five million unemployed Americans.

Union leaders believe an AFL–CIO sponsored march on Washington by special bus and train might spur Federal action to stimulate the U.S. economy.

Walter Reuther, chairman of the Executive Council's Economic Policy Committee, was reported to favor the idea.

"I'm afraid Congress and the administration do not realize how serious unemployment is," Reuther said. "We have to use some shock treatment to wake up our Government."

AFL–CIO economists said the official figure of 4,724,000 unemployed in January ignored millions of part-time workers as well as others who have ceased job hunting and accordingly are not considered part of the labor force.

There speaks the real leader of the Democratic Party, not the official heads of the party but the fellow that calls the shots, furnishes much of the money which aids the Democratic Party in elections, contributes to the success of so many Democratic candidates.

Reuther suggests a march on Washing, and again this is what he said:

We have to use some shock treatment to wake up our Government.

I do not know why they did not put it in the civil rights bill, but there is no protection in that legislation for employers.

In Reuther's book all who are not paying dues to contribute to his war chest should be forced to create jobs, meet a payroll, so he may collect and prosper politically. If my understanding of this Reuther move is correct, he proposes that we draft those who have heretofore been employers and those who show any ability or have any prospect indicating they might have the ability to qualify as employers and make them provide jobs at a Reuther-approved wage scale for all the unemployed, of whom there are more than 4 million—almost 5 million—as well as for increased wages for Reuther's dues payers.

It does occur to me, although I would not be so presumptuous as to offer advice to the Democrats or their party or its so-called leaders, but if they do not watch out just a little bit, they will find Reuther and Mazey, his goon squad leader, out in the open publicly giving orders.

It was back in 1953, I think, when some on our side wanted to help the Democrats who were being thrown out of control of their own party in Wayne County, Mich., but our efforts were rejected, not only with scorn but some abusive language. I have a very distinct recollection of that. We offered to help our friendly enemies then, help them from being taken over by a political organization whose leaders had socialism as one of its objectives.

It is difficult to understand how some Democrats can fool themselves to the extent where they think that Walter Reuther will do anything for the Democratic Party. As he has in Michigan, where he and his errand boy Williams have made the State hot for employers, aided in creating and maintaining unemployment, Reuther will use the Democratic Party until he is strong enough politically, to throw off the mask, and take over publicly.

Watch your step, dear colleagues, you have already lost control of your party in Michigan and several other States.

THE REA PROGRAM

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] may extend his remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, the present policy of this administration toward the REA has caused me to agree wholeheartedly with bills introduced by Senator HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, and Congressman PRICE, of Illinois. The object of these bills and the object of the bill that I am now introducing is to return to the Administrator of the REA all functions which were transferred from that office by Reorganization Plan No. 2 written in 1953. The REA program has had an interesting organizational history since its inception during the New Deal days. REA was established by Executive order of President Roosevelt in 1935. In 1936 it became an independent agency as a result of an act of Congress. Under a reorganization plan of the Department of Agriculture in 1939 the REA was placed under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. The reorganization of the Agriculture Department which came at the beginning of the present administration in 1953 downgraded the importance of the REA and the role of Administrator in policy formation. The Administrator is no longer responsible directly to the Secretary of Agriculture. He is now responsible to the Director of Agricultural Credit Services. He, in turn, is responsible to the Office of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Under such an arrangement the REA loses its identity and becomes just another one of many departments within the Department of Agriculture. When the responsibilities for REA policy are diffused throughout a number of offices in the Department, the historically intended purpose of keeping the REA as an important segment of our farm policy is defeated.

Consequently, it now appears to be quite clear that REA was most effective when it had preferred status and when the policy for REA rested solely with one Administrator and the Secretary of Agriculture. Because of this, I feel that it is of great importance that Congress passes a bill which will return functions previously held by the Administrator before 1953 to the Administrator of the REA.

SHARP INCREASE OF UNEMPLOYMENT REPORTED IN JANUARY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KEOGH). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, much concern is evident in Congress over the sharp increase of unemployment reported in January. These figures show the national unemployment level stands at 4,724,000. This, Mr. Speaker, is the highest level of unemployment in any January since prior to World War II.

Some weeks ago, President Eisenhower set up a Commission, headed by Vice President NIXON, to study ways and means of controlling inflation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, in view of the mounting unemployment, that the President should give serious thought to rechristening this group as the commission on antideflation.

It shall be my purpose in these remarks today to show that the policies and lax administration of governmental bureaus is one of the major factors causing unemployment and unsettled economic conditions.

Mr. Speaker, since this Congress convened on January 7, many bills have been introduced in both Houses to help depressed areas, to help cities finance community facilities, to increase unemployment benefits, Federal aid to housing, and other types of Federal assistance in one form or another. All of these bills have one primary purpose—to reduce unemployment. To help our wage earners maintain their personal dignity in supporting their families by the honest sweat of their brow. My State has had a lot of unemployment, and I intend to fight for sound legislation that will help my constituents.

It is beyond my power of conception to understand how anyone not only accepts but supports actions that would keep their own people out of employment. I saw something the other day that struck me very forcefully and started me doing a little investigating. In the January 30 issue of the Washington Post and Times Herald was an article entitled "Hill Critics Assail Bid Rejection."

It seems that the U.S. Government was going to buy some turbines for a Federal hydroelectric dam down in Arkansas. Some English electric company I believe, bidding against American firms, was low bidder by some $300,000. The administration, I understand on advice of the Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization, turned down the English company bid and is going to buy these turbines from a Pennsylvania company.

I seldom take a position of defending this administration. In fact, I disagree with it a great many more time than I agree. But this time it is right. I am glad to see that it has an OCDM agency here giving it some sound advice.

But, Mr. Speaker, reading the Post article brought to mind I had seen somewhere that TVA had bought a lot of generating equipment from some European country. I looked that up and found that TVA had bought three 60,000 kilovolt-ampere electric generators from a Swiss company named Brown Boveri, instead of buying from a Milwaukee company which was the lowest American bidder. Milwaukee has a lot of unemployment. Skilled mechanics—machinists and electricians—walking the streets or on relief because they do not have jobs. And yet, a Government power business, financed by the taxpayers from all over the United States, does its buying overseas and deprives our own citizens of a chance to make an honest living.

I have not looked it up, Mr. Speaker, but if I were a gambling man, I would make a fair wager that the city of Milwaukee—its businesses including the one deprived of this work and its citizens including the ones who are now idle because TVA makes its purchases overseas—has contributed more tax funds to the building of TVA than any city in the State of Tennessee.

Since the above two instances came to my attention without any research on my part, I thought it would be a good idea to investigate a little further. Mr. Speaker, you will be amazed at what I found.

TVA has been and is still buying transformers from overseas. They have bought over 2 million kilovolt-amperes of transformer capacity from foreign suppliers. The Bureau of Reclamation has bought thousands of generators and millions of kilovolt-amperes of transformers, with a goodly numbers of oil circuit breakers, from foreign countries. The Army Engineers are buying generators, turbines, and transformers from foreign countries. Their purchases run into millions of dollars. From the way the Bonneville Power Administration has been buying transformers from foreign manufacturers, you would think transformers were not even made in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I desire to call attention to the protest filed by the General Electric Co. as reported in the Wall Street Journal on Wednesday, February 11, complaining that the TVA had just awarded a contract for a 500,000-kilowatt steam turbine generator to the C. A. Parsons & Co., of Newcastle, England. The article follows:

NEW YORK.—General Electric Co. announced it will protest the recent award by the Tennessee Valley Authority of a contract for a 500,000-kilowatt steam turbine generator unit to a British electrical firm.

The TVA last Friday gave the contract to C. A. Parsons & Co., Ltd., of Newcastle, England. The English firm's bid was nearly $5,500,000 lower than G.E.'s bid, which was the lowest of U.S. manufacturers, according to G.E. W. S. Ginn, G.E.'s vice president and general manager of the turbine division in Schenectady, said he hoped the "TVA action will not set a dangerous precedent." He added that the United States should curtail, on the ground of national security, the activities of governmental agencies in buying foreign-built turbine generator units.

He charged the foreign manufacturers can underbid their U.S. competitors because of the substantially lower wage rates and competitive facilities overseas.

G.E. and other domestic turbine generator builders bid against foreign competition for an order to be placed by the city of Los Angeles for two 200,000-kilowatt steam turbine generators. Mr. Ginn said the contract has not yet been awarded, but, if Los Angeles bases its decision only on price considerations, "we may expect this business also to go to foreign manufacturers."

Other government power agencies, such as State authorities, public utility districts, and municipalities see "papa"—the Federal Government—buying from overseas, and I guess they think they have to do the same. A public utility district out in Oregon, I see, bought over a million horsepower of turbines from an English company.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Did I not read a few weeks ago about a strong protest that the people of West Virginia were making about the decline in the export of coal to Europe?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Is not the export of coal one of your goals in West Virginia?

Mr. BAILEY. It is. But it is finished now since the action of the German Government—at least 14 million tons of it.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. In other words, you are not interested in the export of coal any more?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly we are interested in the export of coal.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Is not this business of selling coal to Europe a sort of two-way street? Do we not occasionally have to buy things from them?

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that on March 1 the Commerce Department will announce some figures that will be astounding. It will show that our export business in 1958 was $4 billion less than it was in 1957. Instead of producing these products at home and shipping them abroad as exports, and then letting those concerns put them in foreign commerce, you are not going to increase our export volume.

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. First let me correct the gentleman. I am not from Tennessee and I am not particularly interested in the TVA, but I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the proponents of the——

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps the gentleman had better wait until I go a little further. Perhaps I will clarify my position on some of these things.

Other public utility districts and cities out in the Northwest have been buying thousands of kilovolt-amperes of transformers of foreign manufacturers. The New York State Power Authority—they are the ones we gave permission to develop Niagara—bought over 4 million kilovolt-amperes of transformer capacity from overseas.

I have only scratched the surface, Mr. Speaker. I am told that in the last couple of years the Army Engineers have bought about a fourth of their electric generating equipment from foreign manufacturers; the Bonneville Power Administration about 40 percent of their purchases, and the Bureau of Reclamation about one-half of theirs. TVA has only been buying overseas for about 3 years, but I am sure they will be right up there with the leaders, especially if we turn them loose to do all the buying they want to with revenue bonds.

Mr. Speaker, this situation brings a lot of thoughts to my mind. There is the great State of New York complaining about unemployment and what is its own agency doing about it? Why it is buying foreign equipment when the same kind of equipment is manufactured right in the State of New York. The Pacific Northwest has been complaining about unemployment and what does it do about it? Why it wants more tax funds to build more Government power facilities so the tax moneys can be used to buy more foreign equipment. TVA—it complains of unemployment too—wants to be cut free to issue its bonds so it can buy more foreign equipment to furnish cheap power to entice industries from other depressed areas.

Why is it that these Government power projects are buying all of this foreign power equipment? I have not heard any complaints about the private electric companies keeping our citizens out of employment by buying foreign electric equipment. Is it because the Government power advocates want to make power a little cheaper so they can propagandize for more Government power? Government power is already subsidized. It pays no Federal taxes and little or in most instances nothing in lieu of local taxes. TVA pays no interests on the money that is invested in it. Other Federal power developments that do pay interest pay less than the Federal Treasury pays on money it borrows to build them. The State authorities, public utility districts, and municipalities that own and operate power systems finance them with tax-free bonds. It would seem to me that these tax and interest subsidies ought to satisfy them without trying to cheapen the power a little more by buying foreign equipment when our industries and our workmen need the business so they can earn the money to pay the taxes to support these Government power developments.

I want it clearly understood that my remarks today do not apply to the rural electric associations. Nor are these remarks an indication I shall vote against all future public power projects.

The more I look into the question, the more convinced I become that we, as a Nation, have become very gullible on the Government power question. We have been propagandized for years by those who are either very naive or have some other ulterior motive to the effect that we must have cheap Government power in this country. This talk about need for cheap power is a farce, anyhow. Power is the cheapest thing we buy today. It is selling now for less than it did in the great depression of the thirties. What other commodities can you say that about? Besides, is a thing really cheap when it is subsidized? It might be cheap to some, but it is costing others money for something they are not getting. In the case of Government power, the Government is not saving any money. The only ones saving money are the privileged industries, businesses, and individuals who are getting this power, and they amount to only about 20 percent of the total and the other 80 percent are paying to subsidize the 20 percent.

I have never been a champion of the power companies. In fact, I have generally supported Government power; but I think it is time for me, along with a number of others from the industrial areas, to start taking another look at this power question. The industrial areas pay most of the taxes and they employ most of the people. I have had it forcefully brought home to me that we have been paying out our taxes to subsidize cheap Government power for other areas so that they could compete for our industries, but now I find they are going even further. They are spending our tax money to buy foreign equipment to put our industries and our working people out of business.

Why are they doing this, Mr. Speaker? There is only one answer. They are trying to get the cost of power that is already tax subsidized down a little cheaper. Buying foreign equipment could only make it a fraction of a mill per kilowatt-hour cheaper at best. Is the buying of this foreign equipment saving the U.S. Government any money? The Government power advocates say these power projects are not costing the Government one cent because the people who are using the power are paying for them. If that is true—and there is some room to doubt it—then the Government is not saving any money and the privileged few buying Government power are not saving enough to find it in their power bills.

Mr. Speaker, I am not against foreign trade. All countries need it, including ourselves. But let us confine our foreign trade to things that do not put our own people out of work. Over in England they have completely socialized their electric power, but do you think the British Government operation is buying electric equipment in the United States when it can get the equipment from English concerns? Certainly not. They are buying British equipment.

If we are going to go altogether on price, certainly these foreign countries are going to undersell us on many items made in this country. And why should they not? They pay their working people much less than ours get. And listen to this, Mr. Speaker: When our Government power agencies advertise for bids on this equipment they tell our manufacturers they must comply with the Walsh-Healey Act and other Federal provisions—and that is as it should be—but mark out all of these things when they invite foreign concerns to bid. They can use child labor, pay starvation wages, work any number of hours a day, any number of hours and days a week, and so forth. Why should they not be able to build cheaper than our American firms? Asking our industries to compete with them is like asking power companies to compete with Government power when the power companies finance on the open money market and pay out from 20 to 30 percent of their gross income in taxes, while the Government power operations are dodging taxes and financing out of the Federal Treasury at below cost.

Now, Mr. Speaker, TVA wants to do some of its financing with revenue bonds. It wants to get out from under control of the Congress. Its supporters say it needs more flexibility. More flexibility for what? More flexibility so it can expand its operations, take over more electric companies, do more building so it can buy more foreign equipment? It looks to me as if it has too much flexibility now. It has already gotten too big for its britches when it can thumb its nose at the welfare of the American working people and American industries. Instead of more flexibility we ought to tighten it up. We should keep it right where it is and shrink it up some if that is possible. We should keep tighter congressional controls on it. Let it come up to see us every year and tell us what it wants to do and how much money it will cost. If it is to the interest of the Government, we can appropriate funds to take care of it, but at the same time we can keep track of all of its shenanigans—we can find out what its policies are on buying foreign equipment and about its policies on buying coal where it is beating mine wages down, which is another sore subject I have not touched on here.

What I have said about TVA applies to other Government power agencies as well. I notice one of the committees in the other body has been holding hearings on a Northwest Power Administration or Authority or whatever you want to call it. It is all the same. They want to be allowed to issue some bonds so they can get more flexibility to do more building to buy more foreign equipment. At the rate they have been buying it out there, if we turn them loose the whole outfit will be foreign business before long.

The next thing we will be running into is a Missouri Valley Authority. I notice a lot of foreign equipment has been going into their installations.

More flexibility—why these Government power operations already have some of us jumping at their beck and call—just give them some more flexibility and pretty soon they will have most of us in their hip pockets. Instead of talking about more flexibility, we had better get them back under control so they will have a little more concern for our working people.

Instead of letting some of their representatives run around over here rooting for all these Government power projects, our working people might better take a look at how their bread is buttered.

Mr. Speaker, we are giving away billions of dollars every year to foreign countries. We are also spending billions of dollars each year in foreign countries, which is a great assistance to their economy. In addition, we are lending them money at very low interest rates, much of which will never be repaid if past experience is any criteria. All of that money comes out of the taxpayers in this country—our working men and women and our industries. Now, are we going to continue to further tax our people to build Government power systems so they can buy the electric equipment in these foreign countries in cutthroat competition with our own industries who provide the jobs for our working people? Where do these Government power people think the money comes from to build their projects? If they are going to dry up the tax sources that finance them, where do they think they are going to get their future financing?

They give very little thought to taxes. Taxes as a subject they do not deal in since they do not pay any. I think it is about time we give them a little lesson in taxes—let them start paying them—they will find out the Treasury Department does not grow all this money they so freely ask for on trees. Then, maybe they will become a little more interested in our American working people and our own industries.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the recent action of the Tennessee Valley Authority in awarding the contract for a new TVA powerhouse to a firm in Switzerland. The Allis-Chalmers Co., of Milwaukee, was the low bidder among American firms. They have 2,300 idle employees. This is one more instance where our lax policies and our evident disregard for American workmen adds to the mounting unemployment rolls.

[From the Milwaukee Journal, Dec. 5, 1958]

ALLIS-CHALMERS IS LOSER ON TVA JOB—GOVERNMENT AGENCY LETS THE CONTRACT TO SWISS FIRM

The Tennessee Valley Authority Board of Directors late Thursday awarded a contract for three 54,000-kilowatt hydroelectric generators to a Swiss firm.

The Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. had opposed the award of the contract to a foreign firm on the ground that lower foreign labor costs gave the foreign firms an unfair competitive advantage over domestic bidders.

The company's protest was backed by local labor and management groups and by several public officials.

The TVA Board said the bid of Brown-Boveri & Co., Ltd., of Baden, Switzerland, was $2,637,135, including $310,000 for import duty.

LOWEST DOMESTIC BID

Allis-Chalmers' bid, which was the lowest of three made by domestic firms, but higher than the three foreign bids, was $1,300,000 or 50 percent higher than the Swiss firm's price, the TVA Board said.

In addition, the Allis-Chalmers' bid was subject to escalation for increased labor and material costs, while Brown-Boveri's bid was firm, the TVA Board said.

Prevailing national policy regards acceptance of a domestic bid by a Government agency as unreasonable and inconsistent with the public interest if the domestic firm's price is more than 6 percent higher than a foreign bid, or 12 percent higher if the domestic firm is in a labor surplus area, the TVA Board said. Milwaukee County has been classified a labor surplus area since July by the Department of Labor.

POLICY IS CITED

National policy, the TVA Board said, is set forth in the "Buy American" Act as interpreted by an Executive order and further modified in practice by the Council on Foreign Economic Policy.

An Allis-Chalmers spokesman said that the company was extremely disappointed that it did not get the contract.

The company issued this statement:

"For many years we have watched various Government agencies pursue the policies as set forth in the 'Buy American' Act as interpreted by an Executive order.

"However, in appearing before the (TVA) Board, we did so because we wanted to plead a cause and a principle regarding the heavy power equipment import problem.

AIMS ARE EXPLAINED

"We thought that the people of Milwaukee and the citizens of the United States should be aware of what was happening. We felt they had a right to know how their tax moneys were being used abroad and by so doing, taking work from our American wage earners.

[TVA has said that the equipment would be paid for by revenues from its power users, chief of which are other Government agencies, primarily the Atomic Energy Commission.]

"The Government purchase of heavy electrical equipment is not limited to TVA. The policy under which the TVA Board reached its decision also governs the purchasing of heavy electrical equipment by other Government agencies.

"This decision of TVA indicates that, despite opposition, the Government intends to pursue this policy.

CAN'T COMPETE, VIEW

"It is quite evident that no American firm can compete in the heavy electrical equipment market with foreign bidders whose labor costs are one-third those in the United States."

The generators are for a $24-million project at Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals, Ala. Construction is to start early in 1959 and completion is scheduled for the fall of 1961.

The Board also awarded a contract for three 74,600-horsepower hydraulic turbines to the S. Morgan Smith Co. of York, Pa. Allis-Chalmers is scheduled to assume control of the Smith firm around January 1.

The TVA Board said that the Smith firm's bid for the turbines was $2,815,950 and $261,000 lower than the next lowest bid from three other domestic firms and one foreign firm.

Allis-Chalmers also bid on the turbines.

TVA's award of the generator construction contract prompted a demand from Mark W. Ryan, president of local 663 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (AFL–CIO), that the TVA Board be fired. His request was in a telegram to President Eisenhower.

He accused the TVA Board of being calloused and indifferent to the plight of unemployed Milwaukee workers. About 2,300 Allis-Chalmers workers have been laid off here.

Ryan's union represents maintenance electricians at Allis-Chalmers.

A spokesman for local 248 of the United Automobile Workers (AFL–CIO), which represents the bulk of the company's production and maintenance workers, said that the TVA Board should at least have given the Congressmen time to investigate before making the award. The local had asked Senators WILEY and PROXMIRE and Representatives REUSS and ZABLOCKI to investigate the situation and try to have the contract awarded to Allis-Chalmers.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, following the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] is not an easy task for a newcomer to this body. However, I thought it would be apropos at the moment to discuss for a few minutes some of the problems affecting the coal industry of my State of Pennsylvania. All of us, of course, should be interested in the entire economy of the Nation. However, for the moment I would like to talk about coal. Having been born and reared in the coal-mining area of western Pennsylvania, I speak perhaps not with authority but at least with some experience. I have watched this industry decline. It is a sick industry, and it is affected by the kind of sickness that is contagious, the kind of sickness that will affect in time every phase of our economy. The coal industry is sick in spite of the fact that in technical advancement, in marketing, and in transportation they have tried to keep abreast of the times without aid or subsidy from the Government.

They are in this sick condition because of three main reasons: No. 1, the failure of this Congress over the years to pass legislation providing for a coal research commission the same as our neighbors in Canada have had for many years. No. 2, because of the importation of competitive fuels into this country, and yet this importation goes on in spite of the fact that there are more payroll dollars paid out per B.t.u. of heat energy for coal than for any other heat source in the world. There are more payroll dollars expended in every community from the production of coal than from any other source of energy. No. 3—and I think this is serious—this idiotic proposition that any country in the world is a better place to do business in than these United States has seemed to become prevalent in this Nation and in this House of Representatives. For some reason or other we put a premium upon America investing in foreign countries. Let me just read something I picked out of the paper at random the other night, something I think is of great importance to the people of the United States. This appeared in a paper of Canadian origin:

If you are looking for profits in stock, then you had better cast your eyes to West Germany, to Japan, to Finland, to Italy, and to seven other foreign countries whose stock increases have passed the United States.

It is easy for Germany, it is easy for Japan, it is easy for the so-called defeated nations to give us competition far beyond our ability to meet, simply because they do not maintain any armies, they do not spend any of their money for national defense. And speaking of that, this little item also came from Canada and is very, very informative. It seems that the Canadian budget this year is $695 million for defense including, mind you, $15 million from the United States in payment for airplanes manufactured by Canada to give away to the Netherlands. Not only do we pay for the planes but we do not even get credit for giving them. We are now Santa Claus by a different method. We are now Santa Claus through an intermediary.

Sometimes some people say to me, "I thought you were a Democrat of long standing." I have been a Democrat all my life, and I suppose I shall remain and die one.

Another thing I also would like to read to you is something which came out this morning. It is not only the investments in foreign countries as such that are inimical to our welfare. It is the investment in manufacturing concerns that use fuel, thereby cutting down the use of fuel here in America.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY] gave you figures showing that the exports of this country as of June 1st had dropped from $23 billion to $16.5 billion. But he did not tell you the whole story. Out of the $16.5 billion of export business that we did, $3 billion was our own money for foreign aid, making a net of $13.5 billion as a balance of our foreign business.

All of us know that we cannot live in an isolated country. I defy anybody to pinpoint anything I have ever said or done that would brand me as an isolationist. But I am first an American, interested in the kind of people my father joined as an immigrant to this country, in which to live his life and rear his family and make sure that every man in my community, willing to work and able to work, if the market is here in America, will be able to get that work. I honestly and sincerely believe that well-intending people in this Congress and in this Nation of ours believe absolutely that the road to peace is paved by a free trade movement. I cannot believe that, because we cannot be an example of strength to the world, we cannot be a leader in this world if in the management of our own affairs we permit 5 million productive workers to be completely out of work and many more millions to be on restricted workweeks.

Let us not kid ourselves into the belief that we are a great world power, because we owe more money than all of the rest of the nations on the face of the earth put together. We have written a budget for this year greater than all of the budgets of all of the civilized nations of the earth. You cannot be a leader when you borrow money to help someone else. The rule of self-preservation is just as surely a rule for nations as it is for peoples. There can be no deviation from that principle. This Nation can exist only as long as it is strong and as long as it believes that America is No. 1 in the hearts of its people.

I think it was Theodore Roosevelt who said that an American has room for only one sole loyalty, and that loyalty is to the American people.

In our actions in foreign trade we are buying materials we do not need and putting them on shelves that are already crowded with surplus goods of this country. My idea of foreign trade is to find the object that somebody needs and make it for them, and to buy from them the objects and the commodities we need.

Christopher Columbus did not start across the uncharted seas to find a country that was producing cheese and olive oil and roasted chestnuts. They had roasted chestnuts and olive oil and cheese in Italy at the time. What he started out to find was some place where they could buy the things that they did not have and sell the things that they did have in surplus. But we have put that in reverse. We are buying bicycles and we have bicycles coming out of our ears in this country. We are buying raincoats, and you can hardly go into a department store in the United States of America but that you can find goods that we produce in surplus.

If we listen to some of those who are preaching upon the hustings today we will find that the patriotic American will go to work in a foreign car powered by Shell gasoline, wearing a suit made out of English worsted or Scotch tweed, with hose of French lisle, shoes of Italian leather, a necktie of Italian or French silk, and a shirt made from Spanish madras, and he will also have underwear made out of Egyptian cotton.

READ ALL THE NEWS

Too often we read only the news we like or want to read and forget to turn the pages to read the fine print. This can cost us a great deal not alone in knowing both sides of a problem, but in fact, it can cost us our jobs, our liberty, and our personal well-being. If you buy a paper, read it—read all of it.

A case in point on the above admonition appeared in the New York Herald Tribune recently. One story covered the President's appeal to Americans to invest more money in foreign enterprises and quoted him as saying that the foreign countries needed money for expansion of their economy and this was the only country with money to spare. Another story on the same page showed that this country was short $1 billion of currency in its everyday needs.

Our gold reserves have been depleted by nearly $6 billion by the flight of gold to foreign countries.

To some of us little people it appears as though someone is wrong. Is it the President? I wonder.

Personally, I will not subscribe to the policy that any other country in the world is a better place for Americans to invest their money in. President or no President to the contrary.

OUR OWN BACKYARD

The Westinghouse local union just wired me about the loss of an $18 million generator order to England. The Elliott Co., of Jeannette, Pa., just lost a $2 million generator contract to Switzerland. We are still trying to have the administration change the order to our own producers. There is not a set rule on imports. Before Eisenhower was elected, an American company was allowed a 25-percent differential, that is, it could be 25 percent higher than a foreign competitor and still be considered low bidder. Then, too, the labor and economic conditions of the area in which the American bidder was situated were given added consideration. Few Americans lost work under this setup. But now, after Eisenhower issued his Executive order cutting the differential to 6 percent, all the foreign manufacturers are as happy as kids on a picnic while the Americans are on the outside looking in.

A spokesman for Allis-Chalmers, after losing out on a large order, made the statement to the effect that his company might as well quit bidding Government jobs, since it could not meet the foreign prices and still carry American taxes, pay unemployment compensation, social security, workmen's compensation, hospitalization, and so forth, on payrolls.

I know he is right because for over 25 years I have fought for better working conditions and higher standards for labor, teachers, public employees, and taxation based upon abillty to pay.

How can anyone expect me and others like me to change our position and now vote to lower our American standards?

Ford Motor Co. has been buying tools and dies in Europe because they are cheaper. Chairman E. Breech, of Ford, said wages paid Americans averaged $2.44 an hour plus 55 cents an hour fringe benefits compared to $1.05 in England and 69 cents an hour in Cologne, Germany. Ford has a plant in Cologne which, incidentally, luckily missed bombing in the war. Of course, Mr. Breech fails to tell us how American die and tool makers can buy Fords if they are unemployed. He also forgot to mention the difference between gross hourly pay and the take-home pay of an American worker. He forgot that the American worker is the heaviest taxed worker in the world.

Many district auto workers who are laid off will never be rehired, according to President R. Leach of local 155 district. This is true because of the imports in both parts, tools, and finished cars and the step-up in automation.

The industry leaders feel they can spend about $20,000 in automation for every worker they can eliminate. R. E. Phlaumer, of American-Marietta Co., said in part: "We can economically spend $17,000 to $20,000 on new machinery if it eliminates one worker—I have no emotional problems about replacing those nice guys who have been working on gang No. 2 for 20 years."

There you have it. We wonder how many products of his company will be bought by these machines when all companies and concerns go all the way and we have all automotive machinery.

THE ANSWER

There is no complete and final answer. It is a continuing and perplexing problem.

For the moment, with 5 million—acknowledged—unemployed, the answer must come quickly. My proposal for immediate emergency action would be to—

First. Reduce age limits on social security, raise benefits; retire older workers, give younger workers work. They will spend more for things they need and the older workers will be able to carry on with a good retirement pay.

Second. Stop imports, unless they are needed for our economic well-being and unless competitive prices are established that recognize our tax burdens as well as our standard of living.

Third. A shorter workweek for industrial workers whose jobs are eliminated by automation.

Fourth. A revision of our income tax law with lower rates and preferred treatment for American investments, rather than the idiotic system of favoring foreign investments.

Fifth. Grant foreign aid only for foreign aid, and not to build up competitive enterprises abroad to flood our American markets with foreign-made goods.

Sixth. Review Federal employment policies and reduce where possible Federal taxes. Especially check the enormous expenditures for defense to wipe out waste, duplication, and poor planning.

Seventh. Create public loans to communities, public facilities, and redevelopment programs.

Eighth. Increase public works in cooperation with State and local governments.

Ninth. Rebuild American pride in our own products, from clothespins to missiles.

Tenth. Stop talking about the weather and do something about it. At least put up our umbrellas.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, how long can we kid ourselves into the belief that we can become stronger by building up our friends and our enemies to compete against us for the world markets as well as our own markets?

Unless we recognize the importance of full employment at home we cannot hope to help the needy peoples of the rest of the world.

Unless we are fortified with a prosperous economy domestically, how can we possibly sell our friends abroad on our ability to guide them to prosperity.

No Member of Congress really wants isolationism. However, by the same token, no Member of Congress wants unemployment, want, poverty, or depression. Because of our inability to cope with world problems except by opening up our Treasury to the world, giving away American jobs, and building our hopes of peace and security on mercenary troops and subsidized nations, we are putting our country into a position of losing control of our own destiny. How many of our foreign missile bases will we be allowed to use in case of war with Russia?

I know and you know that we cannot live in a world of our own. Nevertheless, I cannot see living in a world where Japan and Germany, the conquered nations, are subsidized into prosperity when American workmen in the coal fields, glass, and manufacturing plants, and many other fields of enterprise are dependent upon charitable aid such as unemployment compensation and welfare for their daily bread.

Sharing our wealth is commendable only if we have wealth to share.

If we are so rich, why do we have a national debt greater than all the other nations of the world put together.

If we are so prosperous, why are we taxed to feed millions of Americans who cannot find jobs to take care of themselves?

As I view it, we Americans operate our trade policies from a socialistic basis of operation and the Communists operate their trade on a capitalistic base.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA HOME RULE LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and that any Members who desire to extend their remarks on the subject of District of Columbia home rule may do so immediately following my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, last July, President Eisenhower sent marines into Lebanon. Britain was preparing to send troops into Jordan, and the United Nations Security Council began an important debate on the Middle East. But on that same day, instead of the energies of the Congress being devoted solely to these great events, they were also being addressed to the problems of a city council for the District of Columbia.

While the Middle East was in turmoil and the President was taking one of the gravest steps since World War II, intertwined with the vital issues before Congress were such items as regulations on overhead wiring in buildings in the District; the power of District court clerks to administer oaths; and expansion of the charter of a local literary society.

These were not especially unusual cases. The Members of this House know by experience the number of strictly municipal matters which presently require the attention of the elected representatives of the people of the United States. We know that a great deal of the time and effort of some of the ablest and most experienced Members of the Congress is spent, as members of the District Committees, attending to the work of city councilmen. We know that they do a devoted and conscientious job, in spite of the demands of their larger responsibilities as Members of this House. But with all due respect, and in all fairness, none of us should be spending our time on these matters. We were not sent here to serve as a city council for Washington but to represent the interests of our districts and the Nation. I believe that my constituents agree with local residents of the District, that nonresident nontaxpayers should not run the local government.

I believe in self-government. I believe in people running their own local affairs. And I believe the people of Washington are as competent as my constituents, or yours are, to elect people to run their municipal government.

I do not believe in Americans going voteless, ruled by people they did not elect, denied control over their own schools, their fire and police departments, and their many local concerns. I do not believe in taxation without representation.

That is why I sponsor and support legislation to put the government of Washington back where it came from, where it belongs, and where the men who founded this country placed it—in the hands of the people who live here. I am not afraid to let Americans govern themselves. I believe the Members of this House share my sentiments and support full democracy in the Capital of the United States.

I hope that no Member will oppose this bill because it does not go far enough. I readily concede that it does not go as far as or accomplish as much as the people of the District are entitled.

It is, however, a long step forward in the right direction.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to set forth a comprehensive analysis of this legislation. My bill is S. 1846—the Bible bill—of the last session, as reported to and passed by the other body in the 85th Congress, except for the change of various dates. I accordingly make bold to set forth almost verbatim, the very fine analysis thereof as found in Senate Report No. 1715, dated June 16, 1958.

PURPOSE OF LEGISLATION

This bill provides for a territorial form of government for the District of Columbia with (a) Presidential appointment of a Governor for the District of Columbia, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; (b) Presidential appointment of a Secretary, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; (c) popularly elected legislative assembly consisting of 15 members; and (d) popularly elected nonvoting Delegate to the House of Representatives. The legislative assembly would have authority to decide how the District of Columbia school system should be administered. For example, the assembly might prescribe an elective school board, an appointive school board, or even a Department of Education with a single administrator at its head.

The members of the Board of Elections—a presently existing agency created by the District of Columbia Primary Act of August 12, 1955—shall continue in office for the remainder of the terms for which they were appointed. Their successors would be appointed without regard to political affiliations, by the Governor. In addition to its other duties, the Board of Elections would conduct registrations and nonpartisan elections as provided for in the bill.

By the District of Columbia Primary Act of August 12, 1955, establishing a formal system of registration by party and election of party officials and delegates to the national political conventions under the supervision of a board of elections, the Congress gave the citizens of the District of Columbia their first taste of suffrage since 1878.

The objectives underlying the bill are threefold: First, to relieve the Congress of the detail of District affairs, as has been done in the case of the Territories, while still retaining the control in Congress required by the Constitution; second, to provide self-government in local matters for the residents of the District of Columbia; and third, to provide an efficient and economical government for the District of Columbia.

The bill provides that on a date to be fixed by the board of elections, not more than 9 months after the enactment of this act, a referendum shall be conducted to determine whether the registered qualified electors accept the charter. As used in titles XIII and XIV of the bill, the term "charter" means titles I to XI, both inclusive, and titles XV and XVI. If the charter is accepted the proposed territorial government would then succeed the present Commission form in accordance with the terms of the bill. Should the charter be rejected by the qualified electors, then the present Commission form of government would be retained. The definition of a qualified elector will be found in title VIII of the bill and is covered in the summary of the bill by titles.

Under the terms of the bill the Federal interest is safeguarded by the following veto provision: An act passed by the Assembly shall be presented to the Governor and shall become law upon his approval as indicated by his signature. If any act so passed shall be disapproved by the Governor, he shall, within 10 calendar days of its presentation, return such act to the Assembly setting forth his objections. If his disapproval is based in whole or in part upon a finding that such act adversely affects a Federal interest, he shall so inform the Assembly when setting forth his objections to such act. If any act so passed shall not be returned by the Governor as herein provided within 10 calendar days after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall become law in like manner as if he had signed it.

If, upon reconsideration of an act returned by the Governor, two-thirds of the members of the Assembly vote to pass such act, it shall become law unless the Governor's disapproval was based in whole or in part upon a finding that such act adversely affects a Federal interest, in which case the Assembly shall again present the act to the Governor and the Governor shall forthwith transmit it to the President, advising the Assembly in writing that he has done so. If the President approves such act he shall sign it, and it shall thereupon become law. If he does not approve it, he shall return it to the Governor so stating, and it shall not become law. The President shall approve or disapprove an act transmitted to him by the Governor, under the provisions of this subsection, within 10 calendar days after its transmission to him; and if not acted upon within such time, it shall become law as if it had been specifically approved by him.

The Governor and Legislative Assembly would take over the functions of the present Board of Commissioners, which would be abolished. The Legislative Assembly would be endowed with local legislative power, including taxing and borrowing power, subject to certain enumerated restrictions and to the overriding power of Congress to repeal, amend, or initiate local legislation and to modify or revoke the charter itself. This endowment of local power would relieve the Congress of the detail of District affairs, as has been done in the case of the Territories.

The Delegate would have the same privileges accorded the Delegate from Hawaii.

A summary of the bill, by titles, follows:

TITLE I—DEFINITIONS

Contains definitions of principal terms used in the bill.

TITLE II—STATUS OF THE DISTRICT

Continues the corporate existence of the District of Columbia, together with all its powers and functions, while changing the governing body thereof. The judicial courts of the District of Columbia will remain as now organized. The only authority with respect to the courts which the bill would vest in the new government is power to enlarge the jurisdiction of the purely local courts to enforce new and additional laws enacted by the new government.

TITLE III—THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

Creates a Legislative Assembly consisting of 15 members elected as provided in title VIII. The qualifications for members of the Assembly are set forth as follows: First, a qualified elector; second, is domiciled in the District and resides in the ward from which he is nominated, and has (a) during the 3 years next preceding his nomination resided and been domiciled in the District and (b) during the 1 year next preceding his nomination has not voted in any election (other than in the District) for any candidate for public office, and has resided in the ward from which he is nominated; third, holds no other elective public office; and fourth holds no appointive office of a full-time continuing nature for which compensation is provided out of Federal or District funds.

The compensation for such members is fixed at $12,000 per annum for the Chairman and $10,000 for members. The powers of the present Board of Commissioners are transferred to the Assembly, except those conferred on the Governor, and the present Board of Commissioners is abolished. The duties of the Zoning Commission are transferred to the Assembly. Powers of the Assembly and the limitations on those powers are spelled out. The Public Utilities Commission, the Armory Board, the National Guard of the District of Columbia, the Redevelopment Land Agency, and the National Capital Housing Authority are specifically excluded from the authority of the Assembly.

The Assembly is prohibited from passing any act inconsistent with or contrary to any provision of any act of Congress as it specifically pertains to any duty, authority, and responsibility of the National Capital Planning Commission, except as to membership on the National Capital Planning Commission and the National Capital Regional Planning Council as pertains to the Engineer Commissioner or the Board of Commissioners.

The Assembly before passing any zoning act is required to deposit it with the National Capital Planning Commission. Under this procedure the National Capital Planning Commission has a veto which may be overridden by a two-thirds vote of the members of the Assembly.

Procedures are prescribed whereby an act passed by the Assembly may be approved or disapproved by the Governor. There is also specified the role of the President in those instances where the Governor disapproves an act. The provision for a Presidential veto, which would be interposed only if a Federal interest were involved, is considered necessary because of the close Federal interest in the District of Columbia as the seat of the Nation's Government and in order to insure a close tie between the local government and the President as the executive head of the Nation. It is contemplated that the Assembly shall within the limitations of the act adopt the usual rules of any legislative body governing the calling of special meetings, quorums, and similar matters. The bill provides for the election from its members of a Chairman and a Vice Chairman of the Assembly, and for the appointment of a clerk as its chief administrative officer and such assistants and clerical personnel as may be necessary.

A procedure is set forth for the adoption and passage of zoning acts. The Assembly is empowered to conduct investigations and to issue and enforce subpenas.

TITLE IV—GOVERNOR AND SECRETARY

Provides for the appointment by the President of a Governor and Secretary by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, each to serve for terms of 4 years. The Governor shall receive an annual salary of $21,000, and the Secretary shall receive an annual salary of $17,500. The Governor shall receive an allowance for official expenses, which he shall certify in reasonable detail to the Assembly, of not more than $2,500 annually. The bill confers on him usual administrative powers and duties, including the power to appoint personnel in the executive branch of the Government and to remove such personnel in accordance with applicable laws and regulations. The Governor would have full authority to execute the powers and duties imposed upon him by law, including the authority to issue and enforce regulations and rules necessary to carry out his administrative functions, and authorizes him in addition to redelegate functions to subordinate officials as he deems necessary.

The Governor shall keep the Assembly advised of the financial condition and future needs of the District, and make such recommendations to the Assembly as may seem to him desirable. He is authorized to issue and enforce rules and regulations to carry out the functions and duties for which he is by statute made responsible. Such rules and regulations, of course, must not be inconsistent with any acts of the Congress or the Assembly. He is further authorized to reorganize any or all of the executive agencies of the District of Columbia government, but is required to submit to the Assembly any reorganization plan affecting two or more agencies.

The Secretary shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Governor shall impose upon him and in case of death, removal, resignation, disability, or absence from the District, the Secretary shall perform the powers and duties of the Governor during such vacancy, disability, or absence, or until another Governor has been appointed and qualified to fill such vacancy.

TITLE V—THE DISTRICT BUDGET

The fiscal year of the District of Columbia is fixed by the bill, and the preparation and adoption of the budget is provided for. The Assembly is empowered to rescind previously appropriated funds which are available for expenditure and to appropriate funds to the extent that unappropriated funds are available.

TITLE VI—BORROWING

The District is authorized to incur indebtedness by issuing its bonds in either coupon or registered form to fund or refund indebtedness of the District at any time outstanding and to pay the cost of constructing or acquiring any capital projects requiring an expenditure greater than the amount of taxes or other revenues allowed for such capital projects by the annual budget, with a restriction that the aggregate debt, including debt owed to the Treasury of the United States, is not to exceed 12 percent of the average assessed value of the taxable real and tangible personal property of the District as of the 1st day of July of the 10 most recent fiscal years for which such assessed values are available. The bill provides that new debt would have to be approved by the voters except that, within the 12-percent limitation, debt up to 2 percent—in the aggregate—of the assessed valuation of taxable real and personal property could be authorized by the Assembly without approval of the voters. The Assembly shall make provision for the payment of any bonds issued pursuant to this title, and the bill sets forth the provisions which must be contained in an act authorizing the issuing of bonds.

The Assembly is authorized to issue supplemental notes in a total amount not to exceed 5 percent of the total appropriations for the current fiscal year if there are no unappropriated funds available to meet supplemental appropriations. Such notes and renewals thereof shall be paid not later than the close of the fiscal year following that in which such act becomes effective. Short term notes may be issued in anticipation of revenues in an amount not to exceed 20 percent of the total anticipated revenue for the current fiscal year.

Bond acts of the District shall, where necessary, provide for the levy annually of a special tax without limitation of rate or amount upon all taxable real and personal tangible property in the District in amounts, which, together with other revenues of the District available and applicable for such purposes, will be sufficient to pay principal and interest as these fall due. In addition, the full faith and credit of the District for the payment of the principal and interest on all bonds and notes is pledged.

Bonds and notes issued by the Assembly and the interest thereon would be exempt from all Federal and District taxation except estate, inheritance, and gift taxes.

The bill would permit national banks, Federal building and loan associations, and Federal savings and loan associations and banks, trust companies, building and loan associations, and savings and loan associations domiciled in the District of Columbia, to underwrite and trade in public bonds or notes of the District issued pursuant to this title.

TITLE VII—FINANCIAL AFFAIRS OF THE DISTRICT

This title provides for the bonding of employees of the District, and the Governor is charged with the administration of the financial affairs of the District. He must prepare and submit the annual budget estimates and budget message; supervise and be responsible for all financial transactions; maintain systems of accounting and internal control; submit to the Assembly a monthly financial statement, by appropriation and department; prepare at the end of each fiscal year a complete financial statement; supervise and be responsible for the assessment of all property subject to assessment within the District; supervise and be responsible for the assessment and collection of all taxes, special assessments, license fees and other revenues; have custody over all public funds belonging to or under the control of the District; have custody of all investments and invested funds of the District.

The Assembly may provide for the transfer during the budget year of any appropriation balance then available for one item of appropriation to another item of appropriation, and the allocation of new items of funds appropriated for contingent expenditure. The bill provides that no officer or agency of the District shall expend or contract to expend any money for any purpose in excess of amounts available under appropriations therefor, except expenditures for capital improvements to be financed in whole or in part by the issuance of bonds.

The bill provides for an independent audit by the General Accounting Office in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller General. Such audit reports as the Comptroller General deems necessary shall be submitted to the Congress, the Governor, and the Assembly. The Governor, the Assembly, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget are given power to enter into agreements concerning the manner and method by which amounts owed by the District to the United States, or by the United States to the District, shall be ascertained and paid.

TITLE VIII—ELECTIONS IN THE DISTRICT

The bill continues the Board of Elections as established by the District Primary Act. Successors to the present Board, after their terms have expired, would be appointed without regard to political affiliations by the Governor for a term of 3 years. The Board is charged with maintaining a permanent registry; conducting registrations and elections; determining appeals; printing, distributing, and counting ballots; dividing the District into five wards as nearly equal as possible in population and of geographic proportions as nearly regular as possible; establishing voting precincts; operating polling places; certifying election results, and other duties. The Board is given authority to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary for the purposes of the act, and the salary of each member is fixed at the rate of $1,500 per annum. Present law provides compensation for Board members at $25 per day while performing duties.

The Board of Elections shall conduct a general election in each even-numbered year commencing with 1960, and in any odd-numbered calendar year commencing with 1961, if an act authorizing the issuance of bonds as required by section 602 to be submitted for a referendum at an election is enacted at least 40 days prior to the date for conducting the election in such year.

General elections are to be held on the fourth Tuesday before the Tuesday in November prescribed for runoff elections. The latter are to be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

The offices to be filled by election are members of the Assembly and the District Delegate. Members of the Assembly shall be elected for 2-year terms beginning on January 1 of the odd-numbered year following such election and the District Delegate shall be elected for 2 years beginning at noon on January 3 of the odd-numbered year following such election. Vacancies in the Assembly are to be filled at the next general election, but until they can be so filled the Governor may fill the vacancy by appointment. In the event the office of Delegate becomes vacant at a time when the unexpired term is 6 months or more, a special election is authorized.

A qualified elector shall be a person who has maintained a domicile or place of abode in the District continuously during the 1-year period ending on the day of the election; who is a citizen of the United States; who is on the day of election at least 21 years of age; who has never been convicted of a felony or, if so convicted, has been pardoned; who is not mentally incompetent as adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction and who certifies that he has not, within 1 year immediately preceding the election, voted in any election at which candidates for any municipal offices—other than in the District of Columbia—were on the ballot. The term "municipal office" as used in the bill means an office of any governmental unit subordinate to a State or Territorial government.

The bill provides that no person shall be registered unless he shall be able to qualify otherwise as an elector on the day of the next election; he executes a registration affidavit on a form prescribed by the Board of Elections showing that he will meet on election day all the requirements of a qualified elector. An appeal procedure is provided for a person who is not permitted to register.

The bill provides for two methods of nominations: First, a declaration of candidacy without petition but with a filing fee equal to 5 percent of the annual compensation of the office for which nomination is sought; or, second, a nominating petition signed in the case of District Delegate by 600 qualified electors registered in the District, and, in the case of a candidate for the Assembly, 300 qualified electors registered in the ward from which nomination is sought. Elections are to be nonpartisan. The ballot is to show the wards from which each candidate, other than the District Delegate, has been nominated. Each voter is entitled to vote for 15 candidates for the Assembly, not more than 3 from each ward, and 1 candidate for District Delegate. Absentee voting will be permitted under regulations adopted by the Board of Elections.

Provision for challenging voters and for appeals to the Board of Elections are made. Poll watchers are authorized, and a procedure is set up pertaining to recounts parallel to that of the District Primary Act with a modification to take care of referendums. The petitioner must deposit a sum of $20 for each precinct to be recounted. The fee is refunded if the election result is changed by the recount. The petition is to the Board of Elections, and is filed by qualified candidates in the elections. In the case of referendums, since there are no candidates in a referendum, any person who voted in the election is eligible to petition the Board for a recount of votes cast on a referendum question.

Violations of any provision of this title or regulations published under its authority are declared misdemeanors and penalities are provided.

TITLE IX—MISCELLANEOUS

Except where the terms of intergovernmental contracts are prescribed by other provisions of law, the District and Federal Governments are authorized to contract with each other for the rendition of services in order to prevent duplication of effort and to otherwise promote efficiency and economy. Such contracts are to be negotiated by the Federal and District authorities concerned and be approved by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget and by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Assembly. Such contracts will provide for payment for the actual cost of furnishing such services.

The costs to each Federal officer and agency in furnishing services to the District pursuant to any such contract is to be paid out of appropriations made by the Assembly to the District officers and agencies to which they are furnished.

The costs to each District officer and agency in furnishing services to the Federal Government pursuant to any such contract shall be paid from appropriations made by the Congress to such Federal officers and agencies.

No member of the Assembly and no other officer or employee of the District shall have any financial interest direct or indirect in any contract or sale to which the District is a party.

Except for the qualifications already enumerated, no person is ineligible to serve or to receive compensation as a member of the Assembly or the Board of Elections because he occupies another office or position or receives compensation from another source. The right of a person to another office under the laws of the United States shall not be abridged by the fact of his service as a member of the Assembly or the Board of Elections if such service does not interfere with the discharge of his duties in the other office.

The U.S. Civil Service Commission is authorized to render advice and assistance to the new government in the development of a merit system.

TITLE X—SUCCESSION IN GOVERNMENT

Whenever the functions of any existing agency or officer are transferred under the bill the personnel—except the members of Boards or Commissions abolished by the bill—property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations which relate to the functions are also transferred. Provision is made for the settling of disputes which may arise out of such transfers.

Any statute, regulation, or other action relating to any officer or agency from which any function is transferred by the bill shall, except to the extent modified or made inapplicable by or under authority of law, continue in effect as if such transfer had not been made. No pending judicial or administrative action shall abate by reason of the provisions of the bill becoming effective, but such actions shall continue with appropriate substitutions of parties.

The purpose underlying this title is to provide continuity in the transfer of existing personnel, property, and funds; to continue in effect present statutes and regulations; and to provide for orderly disposition of pending actions and proceedings.

TITLE XI—SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

This title provides that, should a part of the act be held invalid, the remainder of its provisions shall not be affected thereby.

TITLE XII—TEMPORARY PROVISIONS

The President of the United States is authorized to take such action during the transition period between the enactment of the bill and the first meeting of the Assembly as he deems necessary to enable the Board of Elections properly to perform its functions. The sum of $500,000 is authorized to be appropriated to the District to pay the expenses of the Board of Elections and in otherwise carrying into effect the provisions of the bill. The full amount of expenditures made under this authorization shall be reimbursable by the District to the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962.

TITLE XIII—EFFECTIVE DATES

The charter—titles I to XI, inclusive, and titles XV and XVI—shall take effect on the day following the date on which it is accepted in the charter referendum provided by title XIV, except as specified in section 1401, except that part 2 of title III, title V, and title VII shall take effect January 1, 1961, and section 402 shall take effect on the day upon which the Governor first appointed takes office. Titles XII, XIII, and XIV shall take effect on the day following the date on which this act is enacted.

TITLE XIV—SUBMISSION OF CHARTER FOR REFERENDUM

The bill provides that on a date to be fixed by the Board of Elections, not more than 9 months after the enactment of the act, a referendum shall be conducted to determine whether the registered qualified electors of the District accept the charter. The Board of Elections established under the District Primary Act is charged with duties of registration and the holding of the charter referendum. Provision is made for the form of ballot to be used at the referendum and for the method of voting. If a majority of the registered qualified electors voting in the charter referendum vote for the charter, the charter shall be accepted as of the time the Board of Elections certifies the result to the President, which must be done not later than 30 days after the date of the referendum. The bill contains a prohibition against the interference with the registration or voting of any qualified elector in the referendum.

TITLE XV—DELEGATE

The bill provides for a Delegate from the District of Columbia to the House of Representatives. He shall have the right of debate, may make any motion, except to reconsider, shall be a member of the House Committee on the District of Columbia, but may not vote, which is the same status as the Territorial Delegates. His term of office shall be for 2 years. No person shall hold the office of District Delegate unless he is a qualified elector, at least 25 years old, holds no other public office, is domiciled and resides in the District, and during the 3 years next preceding his nomination (a) has been resident in and domiciled in the District and (b) has not voted in any election—other than in the District—for any candidate for public office. The bill amends several statutes relating to Territorial Delegates and the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, to make them applicable to the District Delegate. The Delegate is to be elected as provided in title VIII.

TITLE XVI—REFERENDUM

The bill provides that the qualified electors shall have power to approve or reject in a referendum any act of the Assembly, or part or parts thereof, which has become law, whether or not such act is yet operative. This power shall not extend, however, to acts authorizing the issuance of bonds, which are subject to the provisions contained in section 602 or to acts continuing existing taxes, or making appropriations which in the aggregate are not in excess of those for the preceding fiscal year. Within 45 days after an act subject to this title has been enacted, a petition signed by qualified electors equal in number to at least 10 percent of the number who voted at the last preceding general election may be filed with the clerk of the Assembly requesting that any such act, or any part or parts thereof, be submitted to a vote of the qualified electors. The Board of Elections is charged with conducting any referendum under this title.

When a referendum petition has been certified as sufficient, the act or parts thereof specified in the petition shall not become operative, or further action shall be suspended if it shall have become operative, until and unless approved by the electors as provided in this title. If the clerk of the Assembly has not specified the particulars in which a petition is defective within 30 days after filing, the petition shall be deemed sufficient for the purposes of this title. An act which is submitted to a referendum which is not approved by a majority of the qualified electors shall be deemed repealed.

TITLE XVII—TITLE OF ACT

Provides that this act, divided into titles and sections according to the table of contents, and including the declaration of congressional policy, which is a part of such act, may be cited as the "District of Columbia Charter Act."

Mr. RIVERS of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, as members of the newest State, we Alaskans can sympathize keenly with the people of Washington, D.C., who want the vote in running their own city government. We know how unsatisfactory it is to be dependent upon a busy Congress, absorbed with national affairs, for the solution of local problems.

Under the proposal which I am cosponsoring, Congress would change the status of the 850,000 citizens of the District of Columbia so that they would be able to elect a local legislative assembly for the passage of local laws and the spending of their local tax money.

Since 850,000 Americans are being unnecessarily prevented from voting at the local level in contravention of the basic American principle of self-government, I regard this proposed home rule legislation for Washington, D.C., as a matter of national importance deserving of nationwide support, which should be made known to the Members of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with the Honorable ABRAHAM MULTER and other distinguished colleagues in seeking to extend a measure of local self-government to the people of the District of Columbia.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join today in urging a return to an important American tradition. When we introduce legislation to provide local self-government for the District of Columbia, we are not proposing a break with tradition—we are, truly, proposing a return to tradition. The men who founded this country believed that every community should have the right to govern itself. They extended that right to the District of Columbia, in a government that endured until the 1870's.

In 1875 the people of the District and the Congress agreed on a temporary change—Congress temporarily took over the local government and agreed to pay 50 percent of the local budget. I say we have failed in both parts of that bargain. Congress has not paid that agreed share of the budget—far from it. And worse yet, the "temporary" has extended for three-quarters of a century. Contrary to the judgment of the Founding Fathers, contrary to the agreement by which the District of Columbia temporarily surrendered its rights, Congress still rules a voteless city without its consent.

I do not believe the people of the District, nor those of us who maintain their right to full citizenship, need to justify or explain our position. If justification is needed, it should come from those who continue to deny this admitted right. They should explain why nearly a million Americans are to be denied their fundamental right to self-government. They should explain why a temporary arrangement should continue for more than 75 years. They should explain why the Founding Fathers were wrong in granting citizenship to the people of the District. They should tell us why they are wiser about the requirements of American democracy than the men who founded it.

The legislation we are proposing here is no radical innovation. It is in harmony with the Constitution and American history. Its principle was accepted without challenge for nearly a century, from the founding of the Republic.

Proposed and endorsed by a Republican administration, this bill was approved by a committee of the other House in the last session, under Democratic leadership. It was passed in that body by a truly bipartisan majority, by an overwhelming 3 to 1 vote of approval. I believe it has had the most careful, the longest, the most expert study and preparation of any legislation ever offered for this purpose.

Alaska has become, and I believe Hawaii shortly will become, a State. Can we at this same time refuse to restore a much more modest right to the Americans who live in the District of Columbia—the right only to conduct their local affairs by their own vote?

I believe the great majority of the Members of this House recognize that we should restore local democracy in the place of all places where it should be a proud exhibit—in the Nation's Capital. If this House is given a chance to vote on the issue, I am confident it will vote to restore home rule to the District of Columbia.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a special sense of responsibility that I join today in the introduction of legislation to provide the District of Columbia with local self-government. I cannot speak for the people of the District; they have no representation here, no voice or vote though these matters concern them deeply. But I hope that I may be allowed to speak with a special sense of sympathy and urgency as one who shares their concern with them.

I and my constituents are neighbors to the people of Washington. Many of us work in Washington, or our businesses depend closely on Washington. Some of us have lived or will live in Washington. We are close neighbors, whose fortunes and affairs are intertwined. We want to be good neighbors.

I am a new Member of this body. But I am an old observer of District affairs, and an old and strong believer in local self-government for the District. I believe the local affairs of Washington are properly the concern of Washington's people. I believe they should have a voice in selecting the government that sets and collects their taxes and runs their municipal government. I believe that they, as Americans, should enjoy the most basic right of American citizens—the right to govern themselves.

As a member of the District Committee of this House, although a new one, I am aware of the sincerity and devotion with which that committee attempts to handle the basic municipal problems of the District as its town council. But I believe, as an American, that Americans can always do a better job of governing themselves than can be done by outsiders. And indeed, I think the Congress has more urgent and more national jobs to do. It should not be diverted from its already heavy burden to spend its time on the details of municipal administration.

Now, I think that most of the Members of the Congress would agree with these propositions. Yet when it comes to the practical, specific case, there is disagreement. Some are reluctant to give up the tradition of the past 75 years even though doing so means a return to an even older tradition of the preceding 75 years. Aware of the national interest in Washington as the Nation's Capital, they are reluctant to entrust the running of the city, even in primarily local matters, to those who live here.

Others, on the contrary, criticize the legislation introduced here today because it does not go far enough. They argue that the government of the District should be completely in the hands of the people of Washington. And I have great sympathy for their argument.

But I am supporting this legislation because I believe it represents a reasonable compromise of national and local interests. It puts the substance of local government in local hands through an elected assembly. It permits the people, through their elected assembly, to decide whether they want an elected school board or some form of appointed administration of their schools. It provides the substance of representation. At the same time, it amply protects the national interest, through Presidential appointment of the local chief executive; through a Presidential veto; and, finally, through the ultimate supervision of Congress. Now it may be as some argue that this does not go far enough. Or, as others argue, that it goes too far. But can we not, in keeping with the American tradition of learning from, and growing with experience, make a start now and see from practical experience how well the balance has been struck? Our whole tradition of government is one of evolution and adaptation within a framework of basic principle. That is what we are urging here today.

This legislation has had the benefit of more experience, more expert assistance in drafting, more careful study, than any such bill we have ever considered. It has been thoroughly and deliberately considered, and overwhelmingly approved in the other body. It has the support of leading civic and political groups in the District that are concerned with this problem. Furthermore, it offers a ground on which sincere men of good will, basically dedicated to the American tradition of self-government can stand together, a ground broad enough to admit of differences of view while commanding agreement that this is a reasonable and sound foundation on which to build.

I know that there will be those who will oppose this bill. But I think there is a great and growing determination in the Congress to give the people of the District a long overdue measure of justice.

So I appeal to you to let the course of debate and democratic decision in this House take its course. Let us work out together, in a spirit of reasonableness and moderation, a plan to restore local democracy to the Nation's Capital, where it should be as an example to the Nation. I believe this bill is an opportunity to do so. If we can work together, as reasonable men, to a resolution of our differences on a matter where basic American values are so clearly at stake, we will have made a real contribution to furthering an atmosphere of reasonable debate in a wider sphere. And we will, at the same time, be restoring a too-long-withheld right to the people of Washington.

By virtue of the composition of this 86th Congress, intense revival of enthusiasm in the community, and a determination on the part of many Members of this Body, I feel that this Congress offers the best opportunity the citizens of the District have ever had for home-rule legislation. It is my sincere hope that the legislation which I am sponsoring will be given early hearings by the District Committee and will be reported out of committee in the near future so that the total House membership will have an opportunity to vote on this critically important measure.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced legislation to give back to the people of the District of Columbia something that Congress "temporarily" took away from them 80 years ago—their right to run their own local affairs.

I do not think any Member of this House would challenge the basic principle of this legislation—that local government belongs to local people. But my concern is practical, as well as one of principle.

Congress has a national responsibility. Every year, the burden of our work as a national legislature becomes heavier. We do justice neither to the Nation as a whole, nor to the people of Washington in particular, when we take time from our duties to try to function as a city council for the District.

In spite of the demands of great national issues and their duties to their own constituents, the members of the District Committee have given unselfishly of their time and energy to the many details of the municipal government of the District. Yet in spite of their fine service, I believe they would agree that Washington, as a city, faces serious municipal problems which need the vigor and the local concern that only a full-time, elected city government possesses. It is simply too much to ask busy Members of this House, more familiar with their own States and districts, and properly more concerned with them, to provide an adequate full-time government for the District. I am sure that the members of the District Committee believe with me that the best government is self-government.

I do not think any of us who has lived long in Washington, who reads local papers, who talks to local people and who observes for himself, can doubt the real problems that exist here. I hope every Member of this House has had an opportunity to read a recent article on Washington from the highly respected Kiplinger Changing Times magazine, which I believe has been reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is convincing evidence of the need for a vigorous local government, elected by the people, with their support and with power to tackle the problems of this city.

These are facts that need no argument; we can see them around us. The decay of the core city is a fact that should, and I am sure does, concern every merchant with a stake in doing business in Washington. The spreading blight of slums in Washington is a sad spectacle in the Nation's Capital—but it is also a real, practical problem for the people who live here and who must pay the social and economic price for a deteriorating city. I believe the people of Washington are concerned and want the opportunity to tackle these problems. I think they are best equipped to do it, because it is their local community. I think we should give them the chance and the power.

I know that Washington is more than a local community. It is also the Capital of the United States. And while the people of Washington can and should be given the right and opportunity to meet their local problems, and run their local affairs, I think they and we must continue to recognize the great national interest in the District of Columbia. I do not believe Congress can give up the ultimate responsibility and I am sure no one will argue that point. It is not at issue. The legislation being introduced today recognizes the national interest in the District and it recognizes and provides for the responsibility of Congress. It leaves final control over the District where it must remain—with Congress. But it puts the immediate responsibility for local affairs where it too must properly be—with the nearly 1 million people who live in Washington. I believe this legislation is a practical and sound way of realizing the interests and the rights of both the Nation and the local community. It is a practical and sound plan for local self-government within the framework of ultimate congressional responsibility for the Nation's Capital. As such, I believe it will benefit the people of Washington and of the Nation and will reduce the job of Congress, as the ultimate trustee of the District, to a size we can more competently and wisely manage.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to insert in the RECORD a brief history of the municipal government of our Nation's Capital. As will be seen from a reading of this summary, the first government of our Nation's Capital as conceived and implemented by President George Washington was almost identical to the form of government proposed in the bill which I am introducing today. It is in the spirit of the Founding Fathers that this legislation is proposed, and it is with a sincere belief on my part in basic democracy that I sponsor this vital legislation.

The controlling constitutional provision respecting the District is article I, section 8, clause 17:

"Congress shall have power * * * To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States."

The first government of the city of Washington consisted of a mayor, appointed by the President, and a city council, elected by the people of the city. This was in 1802. In 1812, the city council was permitted to elect the mayor of Washington, and in 1820 and thereafter the mayor was elected by the people. This government continued until 1871.

By an act of Congress, February 21, 1871, the corporations of Washington and of Georgetown were abolished and a territorial form of government, consisting of a Governor and board of public works, and a legislative assembly, was set up. The legislative assembly consisted of a council of 11 members, and a house of delegates of 22 members. The District also had a Delegate in the House of Representatives. The Governor, the Board of Public Works, and the Council were appointed by the President. The 22 members of the house of delegates were elected by the people. The District of Columbia had a Delegate in the House of Representatives until 1875.

This form of government lasted 3 years, or until June 20, 1874, when Congress provided that the District of Columbia should be governed by 3 Commissioners, appointed by the President. This was known as a temporary form of government, and lasted until July 1, 1878, when the present permanent commission government was set up. In the creation of the temporary commission form of government in 1874, and the permanent form in 1878, no provision was made for the franchise and so, for the first time in three-quarters of a century, no part of the District exercised the right of suffrage.

In 1878 the expense of the Federal City was borne jointly by the District and the United States, on a 50–50 basis. In 1922, this was changed to a 60–40 ratio, and in 1938 the share of the United States was changed legally to a lump sum, which today is approximately 14 percent of the general fund.

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITY IN THE SOUTH

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALFORD] is recognized for 50 minutes.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, I humbly beg the indulgence of this distinguished body in my "speaking out," as it were, so soon in the 86th Congress, but I am concerned that our Justice Department yields to pressure from an organization such as the NAACP and strikes out with lightninglike speed within the past month to overturn the will of a majority to satisfy the propagandizing desires of a minority of a minority. We must never forget that majority rule is the democratic way in America—not rule by minority or dictatorship. Are there no rights beholden to the majority?

I wish to preface these remarks with the statement that I am certainly not one of those individuals who looks under the bed at night to ascertain whether a Communist is hiding there.

Frankly, however, I am alarmed at the complacency of some officials toward the menace of the Communist conspiracy—to transform our representative government into a centralized, totalitarian dictatorship, to abolish property rights, and to make this great Nation of ours part of a one-world government, operated from Moscow.

The Director of our respected and most efficient Federal Bureau of Investigation—the Honorable J. Edgar Hoover—has told us that the two great dangers to this country are communism and corruption. May I say here that any inference which might be gleaned from any public utterance which I have ever made must not and should not be construed or interpreted as being uncomplimentary to the FBI and its loyal agents. I am critical of their political superiors, the Justice Department, but until this present moment the Federal Bureau of Investigation is without a peer in its efficiency. Our FBI Director, as we all know, has published a very fine book—a book which I personally believe should be required reading in every high school in the land. Its title is "Masters of Deceit." In this great contribution to the security of America, he has documented well the Communist objective to destroy the Government of the United States, as well as other representative, free governments of the world. I repeat that Mr. Hoover has told us that the two great dangers to this country are communism and corruption—and I respectfully call your attention to the fact that the Director mentions communism as the first of these two great dangers.

I shall respectfully present today proof that racial agitation is a major weapon of the Communist party—and that many of the racial incidents of the past 25 or 30 years can be traced directly to Communist leadership and direction.

I have here an offset reproduction of a pamphlet, published in 1928, entitled "American Negro Problems." It is a program to promote racial strife in the United States, presented by a representative of Moscow. His original name was Joseph Pogany. He has masqueraded in our country under such aliases as John Pepper, John Swartz, and John Swift. On page 12 of this document, this Communist leader tells plainly that the propaganda line for work among the Negroes is to emphasize plans for establishment of a Negro Soviet Republic in the South.

America has grown great with the traditional social system that has been maintained until the present time. Our social system with respect to races has been part of the very fiber of our social structure in every section of our country—although more strictly adhered to in some sections because of the large percentage of a particular minority. There was nothing mean or violent or malignant about our social structure; good will among all men was practiced every day in the easygoing boundaries of our social life. The Negro was encouraged in his education and we shared his joy and his sorrow; we were there when he was sick and ready to counsel when called upon. A healthy social system was developed, the like of which has never been known before. Under this system the Negro made more progress than in any other country in the world. We of the Southland were for the Negro with our hearts and not just with bayonets. But, in more recent years, especially since the militant strides of international communism, there have been a few leaders who pushed a few well-meaning people into militant action. I am convinced that a few of our good Negro citizens have become pawns of this international conspiracy without being conscious, in the beginning, of its vicious intent of creating mass agitation to divide and conquer the greatest democracy that has ever appeared on the scene of world history. The white friends were not disturbed at first over the militant march of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Southern people are traditionally and basically friendly, and no intelligent Southern white would ever think of being cruel or unkind. It would have been a sign of improper upbringing. The South, both white and colored, was happy with the evolutionary method of progress, but illegal and military enforcement of destruction of age-old social customs with overnight speed has played into the hands of the Communist Party.

Yes, it was back in the 1920's that Communists began telling Negroes about plans to take over the southern part of the United States, secede from the rest of our country, and establish a "black Soviet." Fantastic? Yes, but not fantasy. This is a well-established fact, documented by the official Communist press by former Communists who have left the party and testified before congressional committees and Government agencies, and by undercover agents of the FBI, who went into the party to obtain proof of its subversive activity. And these same sources have produced the proof that since 1928, when the Sixth World Congress of the party sent out the Communist program for propagandizing the American Negroes, the Communists have been exploiting the Negro to divide the people of the United States.

I am sure that many Members of this House will recall, when Federal troops occupied Little Rock in the fall of 1957, that the television newsreels and press of the Nation carried a scene that purported to show a white woman "befriending and comforting" a young Negro girl who had left her new modern Horace Mann High School to enter the 33-year-old Central High School. Of course, the reporters and photographers had no way of knowing that scene was a staged affair. However, an inquiry would have revealed that the white woman was the notorious Grace Lorch—the well-known former Grace Lonergan, a Communist functionary, whose record is in the files of the FBI, the Senate Internal Security Committee and the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Files of both the House and Senate committees mentioned contain evidence that Mrs. Lorch was identified in Boston, 9 years ago, as a Communist organizer, that she attended the Massachusetts Communist Convention in 1943, and that she was a member of the New England District of the Communist Party in 1945. Her yeoman service to the Communist apparatus was so great that she was sent to Arkansas, via Nashville, Tenn., and other points, to help create racial incidents in my State. She and her husband, Lee Lorch, moved into a home in the neighborhood of Daisy Bates of the NAACP.

Grace and Lee Lorch were in Little Rock in the summer of 1957—just before the school crisis in the fall—where Lee Lorch was a teacher at Philander Smith College, a Negro institution. He was placed on the faculty of Philander Smith after having been fired from Fisk University, a Negro college at Nashville, Tenn. Fisk authorities declined to renew his contract after he had hidden behind the first and fifth amendments in refusing to answer questions at hearings regarding his Communist affiliations. Lee Lorch, during the early period he spent in Little Rock, was financed, in part, by an appropriation from Congress, since the National Science Foundation provided a grant of $9,800 made toward the salary of Professor Lorch. The shocking thing about this is that the grant was made after Lorch had been separated from the faculties of City College of New York, Pennsylvania State University, and Fisk University because of his refusal to answer questions concerning his Communist affiliations. Professor Lorch was identified as a Communist in 1950 hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The identification was by two former FBI undercover agents. He and Grace Lorch have figured in other congressional hearings since he was unfrocked in 1950. While teaching at Fisk University in 1954, he declined to answer questions of the House Committee on Un-American Activities concerning his Communist affiliations. Within hours after this defiance, Fisk authorities announced his contract would not be renewed.

Shortly thereafter, Professor Lorch was employed by Philander Smith College in Little Rock, a Negro institution, by its president, M. Lafayette Harris, who is a director of the Southern Conference Educational Fund. Public records, on file with the House Committee on Un-American Activities, show that M. Lafayette Harris has been identified in activity of Communist-front groups no less than a half-dozen times.

Grace Lorch proved she is an expert at racial agitation when she staged the exhibition of alleged friendship by putting her arms around the Negro girl, being very careful to receive the full attention of unsuspecting newsreel cameramen. This is the scene with which you are all so familiar. Grace Lorch performed her assignment well, for she was rewarded for this stunt when the Emergency Civil Liberties Committee transported her to New York and there sponsored a $10 per plate dinner in her honor. The Emergency Civil Liberties Committee is a shock-troop or commando-type group allied with Communist-dominated civil liberties agitation. The Communists have developed a great money-raising vehicle in their program of race agitation in the South. They encourage and promote racial incidents, create and ballyhoo a hero or heroine, then bring them to the East for a series of rabble-rousing dinners and rallies. Of course they pass the hat around at these meetings to bring in the filthy lucre of this, as they dub us, "imperialistic, capitalistic nation."

In this objective the Communist bosses have succeeded well. Never before, in the history of mankind, has a nation become so divided by such a propaganda campaign—known in modern-day parlance as psychological warfare.

Let us look at Daisy Lee Bates, the head of the NAACP in Little Rock, and her husband, Lucius Christopher Bates. Records of the Louisiana State police show that they were arrested in Monroe, La., on November 16, 1934. Lucius was convicted of carrying a concealed weapon and was fined $100. Daisy was held for investigation and was released with Lucius when he paid the fine. Back in 1952 before the Bateses became so prominent in the NAACP they were both arrested by Little Rock police and paid fines for gambling. Each was also convicted of contempt of court in North Little Rock. The name of Lucius Bates is listed as a member of the board of directors of an organization known as the Southern Conference Educational Fund which was established after its predecessor, the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, was declared a Communist-front by the House Committee on Un-American Activities, 1947.

This same Daisy Bates is also a national officer in the NAACP, the same organization whose national officers and national committee members, I am reliably informed, have a record of some 2,000 instances of Communist activity; 145 out of 236 national officers and national committee members have records of Communist activity.

Very convincing is the record of James E. Jackson, Jr., a Moscow-trained Negro, who has been in the forefront of Communist organization work in a number of States, both North and South, for some 15 or 20 years or more. Unless he has left Russia in the past few days, this Communist, James Jackson, is even now in Moscow. He went to the Soviet Union several days ago to attend the 21st world congress of the Communist Party. The National Americanism Commission of the American Legion, in its publication, The Firing Line, calls attention to testimony in the files of the Louisiana Legislative Committee, reflecting that the Southern Regional Council was formed by James E. Jackson, identified as a southern organizer of the Communist Party. Permit me to quote from the May 15, 1957, issue of The Firing Line.

Records of the American Legion reveal a definite trend of interrelationship between the Southern Regional Council and the Southern Conference for Human Welfare, a defunct Communist-front organization.

That is the Southern Conference for Human Welfare—the organization which went out of business after it was cited and was replaced by the Southern Conference Educational Fund. James Dombrowski was executive secretary of SCHW. He holds the same position with the SCEF, which continued in the same headquarters at New Orleans and with the same telephone number that was formerly assigned to the SCHW. After hearings in New Orleans, in 1954, the Senate Internal Security Committee issued a report, stating that the SCEF—and I quote—"is operating with substantially the same leadership and purposes as its predecessor organization," the Southern Conference for Human Welfare.

But let us return briefly to the Communist, James Jackson, the man who was credited by the Communist Daily Worker on December 2, 1954, with having formed the Southern Regional Council. Parenthetically, permit me to remind you that Daisy Bates, the head of the NAACP in Arkansas, is a director in the Southern Regional Council setup. This council established 12 auxiliary groups known as State Councils on Human Relations. These State councils, mind you, were established only in 12 Southern States. Not one chapter was established outside the South.

One of the incorporators of the Arkansas Council on Human Relations is Harry Ashmore, the renegade journalist who is editor of the Arkansas Gazette in Little Rock, and who has profited quite materially in the capitalistic line by writing detrimental articles about his native Southland. This same Harry Ashmore was, and still is, a director of the foundation which provided approximately a half million dollars to finance and operate the Southern Regional Council.

I have here with me the highlights of the record of James Jackson, Jr. It shows that he has been an active top Communist Party worker in Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama, Michigan, New York, California, and other States. One of the titles he held was as southern regional director of the Communist Party. He was also the moving influence behind an organization called the Southern Negro Youth Congress. He once headed communistic activity in Louisiana. And after Pine Bluff, Ark., and Little Rock, Ark., had been designated by Moscow as areas to be colonized for Communist-led race agitation, this James Jackson conducted the Arkansas survey to determine the intensity of agitation necessary to divide the people of my State. His yeoman service brought him advancement to alternate membership of the Communist National Committee. He has conducted Communist training schools and lecture courses in the party's program to brainwash and indoctrinate American Negroes.

James E. Jackson was one of the Communists convicted in New York in July 1956 for violating the Smith Act. Evidence showed he and his comrades had conspired to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence. But his 2-year sentence was set aside by the Warren-Myrdal Supreme Court in August 1958. The Court has freed a number of Communists convicted of conspiracy to overthrow our Government by force, under a ruling that mere teaching of forcible overthrow did not measure up to a call to action. And so, this Communist, Jackson, was freed to return to the South, to help promote race agitation in Arkansas, and to go to Moscow this year as a representative of the Communist Party, U.S.A., at the 21st World Congress of the Communists.

I have in my possession more detailed records concerning the communistic activity of this man, James Jackson. He has spearheaded the organization and promotion of the Communist conspiracy at the Ford Motor Co. in Detroit; served as a delegate and emissary to national and international meetings and conventions of the party; taught in Communist brainwashing and indoctrination schools, and helped to establish and promote front organizations to enlist the unwitting support of well-intentioned, but oft-misguided, dupes.

Traveling about the South today, distributing the doctrine of totalitarian government, is a husband-wife team by name of Carl and Ann Braden. Carl Braden is free to roam the Nation, these days, because of a ruling by the U.S. Supreme Court that Federal statutes against sedition have preempted State sedition laws. Braden is now a field secretary for the Southern Conference Educational Fund, which was formed after the SCHW was revealed as a Communist front. As a Communist boss in Louisville, Ky., Carl Braden was indicted on charges of sedition in Jefferson Circuit Court, State of Kentucky. He was convicted in December 1954, subsequently sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment and fined $5,000. Evidence at the trial, with the prosecution conducted by State's Attorney Scott Hamilton, showed that Braden purchased a home in a suburban Louisville community occupied exclusively by white families and, then, transferred ownership to a Negro named Wade. It was further shown at the trial that the home was dynamited on June 27, 1954, and the grand jury determined, after visiting the scene of the crime, that the dynamiting was "an inside job" perpetrated to create an incident. The prosecution maintained that Braden was the "common denominator" of the explosion. Shortly after this home purchasing and bombing incident, Carl Braden received a letter from a comrade who signed his name as "Al," otherwise unidentified in the trial record. The letter stated that the latest project of the Bradens—the Wade home acquisition—constituted a "breach in the wall" of what Comrade Al referred to as "the real estate trust." Al told Carl and Ann their project "left us breathless."

Prosecutor Scott Hamilton and Kentucky Attorney General Jo M. Ferguson

appeared before the Senate Internal Security Committee at Memphis in October, 1957, to urge that Congress pass legislation to restore State antisedition laws. Mr. Hamilton repeated at the hearing the story of the dynamiting in June, 1953, of a Negro store at Manchester, Ky. The Commonwealth's attorney was asked by the Internal Security Committee Counsel whether he was "making the point that perhaps the Communists, themselves," were responsible for the bombings. Mr. Hamilton replied: "That is the construction we put on it."

As I stated before, Carl Braden is now working as field secretary for the Southern Conference Educational Fund. The Supreme Court ruling in the Steve Nelson sedition case in Pennsylvania gave Braden his freedom from conviction in the case of the Kentucky dynamiting. But Comrade Carl has another conviction hanging over him today. Last summer, he was summoned as a witness at hearings in Atlanta of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. There he refused to answer questions concerning his Communist activity. The committee was investigating Communist influences in industrial plants of the South. Braden and his comrade, Frank Wilkinson, a party leader from Los Angeles, were indicted by a Federal grand jury for contempt of Congress. They were tried and convicted at the January term of court in Atlanta.

And while we are on this Atlanta hearing of last July, Mr. Speaker, permit me to respectfully call to the attention of the House the most praiseworthy results obtained by the Committee on Un-American Activities from this investigation. When the committee chairman, the Honorable FRANCIS E. WALTER, of Pennsylvania, announced the investigation of Communist infiltration of southern industries, there was immediately instistituted a propaganda campaign ridiculing the suggestion that there might be Communist influences in industrial plants of the South. Editorials of prominent newspapers were published, apparently designed to discourage the investigation. News stories about plans for the hearing were brief, many being buried on the inside pages. But before the hearings were concluded, the story was transferred to page 1, column 8. The investigation produced evidence that Communist colonizers had taken jobs in industries of our section of the country. One reluctant witness, a Mrs. Madge Cole, who holds a bachelor's degree from Cornell and a master's from Syracuse, was shown to be working on a loom in a Greensboro, N.C., textile plant. She was identified by Armando Pehna, former undercover agent for the FBI, as a colonizer for the party. Her application for a textile worker's job made no reference whatever to her university degrees. Another witness, equally as reluctant, was a young man named William Robertson III, a graduate of the University of North Carolina, where he has also pursued postgraduate studies.

He was employed as a sweeper in a Durham textile mill, and his application for employment also conveniently omitted information about his college training.

The attitude of all the hostile witnesses, with Communist or "front" records, who were summoned to the Atlanta hearings, was that they had been subpenaed because they were supporting the move for forced racial integration.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude these remarks, I desire to point out that there existed in certain southern colleges and universities Communist cells, where even faculty members, with Communist records, were leaders in race agitation.

Proof of the existence of a Communist cell at the University of Tennessee School of Medicine in Memphis was uncovered at the October, 1957, hearings of the Senate Internal Security Committee. Dr. Ralph Franklin, a reputable physician now practicing at Morehouse, Mo., told the committee he had been influenced by a Dr. Vincent Myers to become a comrade while he was studying medicine in Memphis. He said he was shocked into quitting the party after learning of its subversive objectives. I wish to add my commendation of Dr. Franklin for the clean breast he made when he testified and for his patriotic contribution to the security of our country in publicly standing up to reveal ramifications of the insidious Communist conspiracy in our section of the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, while I am alarmed at the seeming general lack of concern by the American people toward this menace of Communist subversion, I am most gratified that we have in this country—in the Congress and in private life, from every section of our great Nation—patient patriots, who refuse to become discouraged.

The Legislature of the great State of Tennessee, only a few days ago, authorized an investigation of Communist influences in Highlander Folk School at Monteagle, Tenn. This school was founded in 1932 by Myles Horton and Don West. It is a southern meeting place for persons who have been leaders in race agitation for many years. Many who have gone in and out of Highlander Folk School meetings have records of affiliations with Communist and Communist-front organizations that, when listed, would cover several pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There is an impression among some of our citizens outside the South that leaders of our section, who are dedicated to resistance to forced integration, have sought to raise the issue of Communist influences in race agitation as a smoke screen to hamper the integration movement. Little notice has been taken of the startling revelations by the Louisiana Legislative Committee, the Georgia Commission on Education, the Arkansas Investigating Committee, the Florida Legislative Investigating Committee, and other leadership groups.

I quote in part from the conclusion of the special education committee of the Arkansas Legislative Council, which held hearings at the State capitol in Little Rock on December 16 through December 18, 1958:

The basic question presented for determination by this committee is: "Has there been subversion present in Arkansas which has encouraged racial unrest?"

It is a matter of common knowledge that communism thrives where strife, tension, turmoil, and chaos is present. Arkansas became a State of the Union in 1836; peace, progress, and tranquility marked the attitude of all our people for the next 122 years. This committee has found that the incident which occurred at Little Rock on September 2, 1957, was not something that just happened overnight. It was planned, schemed, calculated, and had as its motivating factor the international Communist conspiracy of world domination squarely behind the entire shocking episode.

The people of Arkansas are basically men of good will. Communism heretofore has always been something that happened elsewhere, but the record reflects that for a number of years fellow travelers, dupes, and those who make a career out of being duped, have flitted in and out of Arkansas, and while here, they sowed the seeds of dissension and discord.

The committee has wondered who sent for Clarence Laws, discredited field representative of the NAACP and who was discharged from the Army for security reasons; who sent for Dr. Vernon McDaniel, protege of the notorious Gomillion, who travels in harness with Communists such as Aubrey Williams, Abner W. Berry, James A. Dombrowski; and who sent for Grace and Lee Lorch, identified Communists; and who paid Clarence Laws for his work in Arkansas. In answering these questions, the committee learned which individuals actively worked for a political party whose candidate would not sign a non-Communist affidavit; that known Communists—Farmer and Pushkarsky—worked in such close accord with the candidate and the above individuals that it makes incredible a claim of innocence. One of these individuals was the State president of the NAACP, and her husband, who has been a national director of an organization which is a successor to an organization listed as subversive for a number of years.

To answer these questions one need merely read the transcript of the sworn testimony produced in public at the 3-day hearing. The testimony under oath and the documentary evidence introduced in connection therewith, makes it apparent that there has been and now is subversion present in the racial unrest in our State.

End of quotation from the conclusion of the special education committee of the Arkansas Legislative Council.

Mr. Speaker, it behooves patriotic American citizens from every section—North, East, West, and South—to take a long, serious objective look at the well-organized, well-financed campaign of the Communist Party to divide the people of our great Nation, destroy our representative form of government and establish a Moscow-dominated totalitarian dictatorship in Washington.

This great Republic was established by our Founding Fathers as an indestructible union of indestructible, sovereign States. So long as we perpetuate the principles of State sovereignty and local self-government, we need have no fear that ideologies from across the sea will destroy us.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FLYNT. I commend the gentleman from Arkansas on his courageous, forthright, and well-documented presentation of the facts he has brought to the attention of the House today. Too many times during recent months an entirely different and an incorrect picture has been painted of the situation which existed and which prevailed in the gentleman's home city of Little Rock, Ark.

It is my hope that those same media of mass communication, newspapers, news magazines, radio, and television, will give to the comments the gentleman has delivered today a reasonable degree of the same prominence and the same publicity which they gave to the dark days when the 101st Airborne Division invaded Central High School in Little Rock, Ark.

I know from my own research that many, if indeed not all, of the instances cited pertaining to these avowed and self-described Communists and Communist sympathizers that the gentleman has named in his speech relate to those who have sought to stir up this agitation where harmony and good will existed before. This, the Communists always try to do.

The gentleman has pinpointed and has, I believe, opened his files on this subject for public inspection to show the Communist and Communist-front affiliations of many of those who played leading parts in creating strife, discord and turmoil in his home city. Those persons named by him and many others have participated in a number of Communist activities and have belonged to, helped organize and helped sponsor countless subversive organizations which are nothing more or less than Communist fronts which often under the guise of respectability bring in unsuspecting persons whose beliefs are just as far from communistic as day is from night. In many instances, these Communist-front organizations have been denounced and listed as subversive by both the House Committee on Un-American Activities and the United States Department of Justice. That infamous group of organizations, spearheaded by these same Communists and Communist sympathizers, when exposed has often gone under cover and risen again and like the Gorgon Medusa grows another snake head as soon as one has been cut off.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is time that this true and correct picture of well-documented facts be made public to the people of the United States. It is, of course, true that not all persons who favor forced integration are Communists, but it is undeniable that the influence of Communists and Communist sympathizers manifested itself in virtually every instance where strife and turmoil supplants longstanding relations of harmony and good will.

It is well that the lines be drawn so that those of us who believe in America and the American way of life can stand up and be counted. If there are those who sympathize or espouse communism and Communists—then those who desire to do so may take their stand. That is their right, but it should be equally well understood that the underlying principle behind every Communist, every Communist group and the whole Communist ideology is to overthrow and destroy the United States Government and the American way of life.

So let those who may sympathize with communism and Communists know full well of their position—one which if carried to the end aspired to by the Communists would be to destroy every last vestige of individual liberty and freedom not only in this country but throughout the world.

Mr. ALFORD. I sincerely appreciate the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Following the next special order, I propose to ask for time, at which time I would like to address some questions on this very important subject to the gentleman, if he will remain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Arkansas does nothing more during his congressional career, he has already justified the confidence that the people of Arkansas placed in him by electing him to this great body. The speech that he has made is one which has been long overdue in this House.

Like the gentleman from Georgia, however, I have grave doubt as to whether the facts, which he so well documented in his speech, will be communicated through the press and through the other means of public communication to the people throughout the country. I entertain these doubts because a paper curtain has been drawn around the South's side of this story as well as the serious constitutional question involved. The National Broadcasting Co., for instance, devoted, by their own admission, several hours of time on the Dave Garroway show in the morning to the presentation of what they called "Violence in Little Rock" during the Little Rock crisis. Fortunately, there was very little violence in Little Rock, as the gentleman well knows, and what little violence did take place, so I am informed, occurred as a result of the invasion of Little Rock by Federal troops. By the same token, when a frustrated school professor committed suicide in Brooklyn and there followed a daily series of race riots, interracial stabbings, yokings, cuttings, and even homicides as the result of race hatreds generated by conditions in these integrated schools, it was only after protests against such one-sided presentations of the news that NBC finally devoted about 5 minutes to the subject of racial unrest and violence in Brooklyn. As the gentleman knows, the Louisiana Joint Legislative Committee, which is an official agency of the State of Louisiana, was forced to purchase a full-page advertisement in the New York Herald Tribune 2 years ago in order to present the South's side of the integration case to the people of that area. They had to buy advertising space because they were unable to break through the paper curtain drawn around their position in the regular news sections of the New York papers. As the gentleman also knows, just a month or so ago a group of patriotic, devoted citizens from Alabama sought to purchase advertising space in the Washington Post and Times Herald in order to print an open letter, which a former president of Chicago & Southern Airlines had written to the President of the United States, giving good and valid arguments in support of the South's case. They were refused the privilege of buying that space in the Washington Post and Times Herald. I believe the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] commented about that in the House about a month ago.

As the gentleman well knows, the South has been the victim of some of the most false, vicious, and malicious propaganda campaigns that this country has ever known. When these obviously biased northern magazines, such as Time and Life, who self-righteously and piously advocate freedom of speech and press, who loudly and aggressively denounce any type of censorship, who advocate that even Communists should have their day in court to present their case, perfunctorily claim to present the point of view of the South, it is usually presented by Ralph McGill, Hodding Carter, or Harry Ashmore, all of whom claim to be moderates.

I can assure the House that these men do not speak for the South or the people of the South.

I repeat that the good people of the South have been unable to break through the paper curtain to tell their story to the Nation, because they have been denied access to the means with which to present it. It is my hope, and I am sure it is the hope of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALFORD] that the several States of the South, as well as States throughout the rest of this country, will assert their sovereignty, as guaranteed to them by the Constitution, to prevent further destruction of our basic and fundamental system of government in this country.

Mr. ALFORD. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. I want to congratulate the gentleman on the very fine, well-written, well-documented story of the South. I think the "doubting Thomases," who wanted to deny you your rightful seat in this House of Representatives, see now that DALE ALFORD won his own election. I do not believe they will care to tangle with you in debate. You have done a good job. We can see now your election was no accident.

Mr. ALFORD. I thank the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GATHINGS. I just want to say to the gentleman that he won a race that was most remarkable. In a period of 7½ days he put on an outstanding and successful campaign in our State. I concur with the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr.

RIVERS]. The people have a right to make their choice which they have done in this instance. You are doing a splendid job here, and I commend you for a fine presentation today.

Mr. ALFORD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Because there is no question as to the desire of the Communists to agitate differences between races, and to play upon any controversies that have developed, I think the gentleman has rendered an important service in documenting that fact in his address.

I should like to address two questions to the gentleman, because I share the concern of the overwhelming membership of the House that there be found resolutions for these problems that will be in the interest of the tranquillity of the Nation and of progress for all of our American citizens.

My first question is: Does the gentleman feel that the possibility of effective communication and cooperation between responsible leaders—as opposed to the type the gentleman has stated—between responsible leaders of both races, has been fatally impaired as a result of the controversies of the last 2 or 3 years?

The second question is this: Having in mind—and I cannot at the moment cite names, but they are of record—having in mind the fact that there have been Negro citizens who have been Communists, who have become disenchanted with communism, and in one instance I recall from the testimony before the Senate Internal Security Committee have presented a most vigorous and emphatic warning to the fellow citizens of his race as to the false promises and the completely fatal effects to their own race of pursuing the Communist course, I wonder if there has been any effort made by the leaders of both races to bring to the attention of the colored citizens that side of the story, and provide an opportunity for that type of person of their own race to present in their own way and from their own bitter experience the lessons and the disenchantment they have experienced with communism.

Mr. ALFORD. May I say to the gentleman in answer to his first question that I do not think that relationships have been completely severed because of the good will that has existed particularly in our section of the country since the founding of this country. I would like to say in the terms of a distinguished jurist of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, St. Louis, Judge Gardner: "Evolution, not revolution is the answer to our present question."

To the gentleman's second question may I say I am aware of the fact that there are certain leaders such as the gentleman has mentioned, but time does not permit documenting all those facts here. I was trying to make my remarks pertinent to my section of the country. There is a great deal of evidence to support the gentleman's claims.

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Speaker, may I say with respect to the gentleman's answer to my first question that I am most worried and concerned that good will and cooperation be not completely destroyed and frustrated and I am glad for the assurance he gives.

With reference to the second question, while I realize that it is not entirely apropos the gentleman's remarks, but I trust it is not presumptuous to express the hope that some constructive contributions along this line may be explored and exploited.

Mr. ALFORD. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me briefly?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. I should like to join with those who have complimented the gentleman upon his statements here today; at the same time I would like to point out to those who sit in this Chamber and honor the gentleman with their presence this afternoon, who are not from this section known as the Southland, that this is not entirely a southern problem; this is a problem that goes to the very foundation and the perpetuation of this glorious young Republic of ours. I do not care whether it is regimentation or centralization in the field of integration or any other field in which our Government operates, it all amounts to the same thing. When the powerful arm of the Federal Government with all of its police power reaches out into every hamlet as well as every metropolitan center in this country and begins the regimentation of the people, it can lead only, in the final analysis, to a totalitarian form of government.

The gentleman has been speaking of communism in this movement. I do not know whether I ought to say this or not, but I am going to say it with some reservations: I must confess that I suspect I have had the high privilege of serving in this House about as long as anyone I see here with the exception, of course, of the gentleman who presides over this House, the Honorable Speaker. I was here when the thing started. Who was the man who walked down this aisle on every possible occasion 10 and 15 years ago to offer amendments on integration? He was neither Republican nor Democrat although he usually sat over on this Democratic side of the aisle. His name was Vito Marcantonio. I say this with some reservation because, unfortunately for him, he has answered the last call that we must all some day answer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

(By unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. COLMER), Mr. ALFORD was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, it was the gentleman from New York who first offered these amendments repeatedly year after year and advocated forced integration of the races. I think the history of this House reflects the political philosophy of the gentleman to whom I refer.

Finally, let me say for the benefit, not for those who reside in that particular section of our country, the South, but to those of you who live in other sections of this great country, those of you who have witnessed the national prohibition era, the attempt by the strong arm of the Federal Government to regiment man's habits in the field of temperance. I doubt if there are a half dozen men on the floor here today who would favor national prohibition. Yet many of them would use that strong arm of a powerful centralized government—yes, even the Armed Forces—against people with whom they have to associate, with whom they have to live, with whom their children have to attend school. I say to you that I would oppose that type of punitive legislation if there were not a Negro in my once-sovereign State of Mississippi, because it violates every concept of the principles upon which this Government of ours was founded.

While I would prefer that sectionalism were left out of the discussion, I will point out that we were living peacefully down there in the South. The white man was extending a helping hand to his less fortunate colored brothers. This is all a relative problem, you understand. It is no problem where you have a few of one race and many, many of another. But down there in this particular section of our great common country we have a problem that is aggravated. We were getting along very nicely. That period of evolution, referred to by the learned justice whom the gentleman from Arkansas quoted, was going along well. The leaders of the colored people appreciated the help of the white people in this evolutionary period.

What has happened now? I will be perfectly frank with you, Mr. Speaker, I have to search my own soul to prevent animosity from arising in my heart against my colored brother because of some of the things that are going on. I say to my people in Mississippi, as I say to you here and now, if I have to be placed in the category of a Negro hater or a Negro lover, put me in the category of the lover of my less fortunate brothers.

Mr. Speaker, the greatest tragedy of all of this misconceived effort to force integration is the fact that an evil wedge is being driven between the two races. I think future history will record the fact that the Negro will be the biggest loser.

Here is a race of people who were brought to this country against their will. They have made the greatest progress of any race of people in the history of the world under the guidance of their white brothers, their southern white brothers mostly. Now, these self-styled liberals, the politicians, and these other people who would reform us overnight—not the South, the Nation—would take a race of people who just a few generations ago, unfortunately, were—well, I do not want to use the word "savage," but were uncivilized in the jungles of Africa and just a few years ago were serfs in bondage—they would take them and by a statute enacted in this body and in the other body, or by an edict of the Court, place them overnight upon an equality with another race of people who for thousands of years have enjoyed all of the benefits of Christianity, civilization, education, and culture. This is not fair to them and it is not fair to the other race, the white race. Neither is it possible. The Negro must trod the hard and slow path of progress, civilization, and culture—the same road traveled through the centuries by the white man. No waving of a magic wand, no legislation, no Court decree is the answer.

I thank the gracious and respected gentleman from Arkansas for his courtesy in yielding to me.

THE SOUTHERN STORY

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it is not often in these days of a paper curtain as tight as the Iron Curtain that the voice of the South can be heard through our land. While the South has a position on grave issues confronting our Nation today, and has clear, logical and intelligent reasons for its position, most of the people of the United States outside the South have no idea what is that position, or why it exists.

The reason for this, Mr. Speaker, is of course that the newspapers of the North and the magazines of national circulation see fit to suppress the story of the South—and even to suppress news in their own communities, news of racial troubles, of the high incidence of crime and disease among Negroes, which would show the reasons for the southern position.

But Mr. Speaker, this paper curtain now has been penetrated. Through the National Broadcasting Co., and one of its commentators, Mr. Chet Huntley, the southern story—told by one of the South's most articulate and knowledgeable men—has been laid before a nationwide audience.

That the story has been told once is not, of course, sufficient to get it across to the country, Mr. Speaker, but that it has been told at all is a credit to the National Broadcasting Co. and to Mr. Huntley. Mr. Huntley's own views are not those of the South, but he has been fair enough, Mr. Speaker, to let the South have its say.

Reaction to that story, told by Thomas R. Waring, the distinguished editor of the News and Courier, a newspaper in my home town of Charleston, S.C., has been highly favorable, not just from the South, but from all parts of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. I will be delighted to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will read the annual report of the NAACP put out for the year 1957, he will find that the NAACP claims credit for assisting and acting in an advisory capacity in the production of CBS programs on race relations in the South. I wonder if the legitimate and honorable Citizens Councils of the South or any prosegregation group was called in also as advisers. I can assure you they were not.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. We live too far below the Mason-Dixon line.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. I saw the program to which the gentleman refers, and I would like to say to the gentleman that I thought the distinguished editor did a very fine job in presenting his points of view. The other side was presented on that same program.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. That is right.

Mr. HAYS. In a very dignified way.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. That is right.

Mr. HAYS. I would say that if we had more of that kind of argument in which both sides respected the other side's view and presented their own, that there would be a lot more possibility of solving some of these problems instead of some of the ways that the problem has been approached.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. That is the first time we have had a chance to get to the eyes and ears of well-meaning and well-intending people throughout the Nation.

I am going to include in my remarks a copy of Mr. Waring's statement on that program, and I ask those gentlemen who are interested to read it and see how tempered, how dignified and how objective was his presentation.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

TEXT OF STATEMENT BY THOMAS R. WARING, EDITOR OF THE CHARLESTON (S.C.) NEWS AND COURIER, ON CHET HUNTLEY SHOW, OVER NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO. NETWORK, FEBRUARY 8, 1959

Mr. Huntley's proposal that the NAACP withdraw from the South would meet with hearty approval, I believe, among most southerners, but not for the reasons Mr. Huntley has expressed. As I understand it, Mr. Huntley believes that mingling of the races could be accomplished with more speed and harmony if the NAACP removed itself. Mr. Huntley has presented legal and other reasons why mixing the races is right. I would like to offer a different viewpoint.

I am a spokesman for no organization or group of people. I am a newspaper editor in a position that offers opportunities to observe and report on people in the region where I live.

I believe it is a fact that the overwhelming majority of southern people are unalterably opposed to mixing races in public schools. They are opposed to it now or later.

They hold this view not on account of hatred or bigotry, as you may have been told. They hold it because they sincerely believe, on the basis of firsthand experience, that separate schools are best for both races.

In presenting this as the view of the majority of southerners, I refer to white southerners, because they are about 75 percent of the population. But the proportion varies greatly. In my home community, for instance, the population is about 50–50. In some neighborhoods, Negroes outnumber whites 10 to 1. In many school districts integration would mean sending white children to Negro schools.

While I do not pose as a spokesman for the colored people, nor pretend to read their minds, I believe that most of them are happy and satisfied. I do not believe the NAACP by any means represents a unanimous feeling among the southern Negroes.

If some southerners are willing to accept token integration rather than shut down their schools it does not mean that they approve, or accept it permanently. Even token integration brings tension and constant threat of disorder, as well as fear of other evils.

If integration is wrong, as we believe it is, we do not concede that a little bit of it is right. The strength of resistance testifies to the depth of this belief. The choice between separate schools and no schools is an agonizing one for people who have spent years developing an education system.

Cordons of police ringed the school at Arlington to enforce admission of four colored children. Not even parents were allowed near the schoolhouse. An Associated Press reporter said the scene presented a picture of "Alcatraz, southern style." The trappings of the police state were mounted within sight of the U.S. Capitol.

It is not alone the entrance of a few colored children at Arlington or elsewhere that created all this furor. White southerners are more accustomed to Negroes than people in other regions. It is the seizure of rights and powers for local self government that makes southern hearts turn cold.

The Supreme Court has rewritten the Constitution it swore to uphold. Chief Justice Holmes, Justice Brandeis, and other liberals accepted the law of the land to mean the States had a right to operate separate but equal schools.

Whether the South closes public schools under threat of mixing, or struggles in some regions with the perils of integration, public education will be damaged.

For white pupils, standards of education will decline. This has been the experience in Washington, D. C., and in other places that have undergone mass integration. The statement is well documented and I haven't time to explore it further.

For colored pupils, the relaxed and familiar conditions of their own schools are lost. Discipline breaks down. We have no blackboard jungles in the South, and we do not want them.

Though not all southern schools, white or Negro, have achieved the highest standards, they have vastly improved in recent years. Southerners have spent billions of dollars on them. They had a contract with the Federal Government that guaranteed separation of the races. They would not have taxed themselves for mixed schools. And nobody knows how long they would continue to support schools they don't control. In any event, public education is bound to suffer.

Local self-government, through division of State and Federal powers, is the keystone of our Republic. It is being torn apart for the sake of a sociological experiment. If a police state is substituted for the Republic, no race will gain.

Once before, in prohibition, the United States experimented with sociology. Prohibition was a failure. It brought on bootlegging and a crime wave. Eventually the people came to their senses. They repealed prohibition. At least, it had the authority of lawful constitutional amendment. This time the experiment is with the lives of children—on the basis of court decrees.

Southerners are concerned for the welfare of both races. They realize the need to educate colored people as well as white. They need colored citizens for manpower in the burgeoning new industries. They want to build the earning power of Negro workers so they can carry more of their share of the economy.

In his inaugual address last month, South Carolina's young Governor, Ernest F. Hollings referred to these problems. He said, and I quote:

"I shall not dwell on the subject of segregation as it affects race relations. We have all heard too much on this subject and there is too much to be done in the days ahead for us to waste our energies and arouse our tempers over a subject upon which we, in South Carolina, are in essential agreement.

"We are fortunate in having a well-nigh boundless store of good will and understanding among all races and beliefs in South Carolina. In our schools, peace patrols the school corridors; unlike New York, we do not need armed guards. The Negroes of our State feel that schools are intended for education. They feel that their Governor and general assembly are doing everything possible to provide them the best educational program and the best opportunity to succeed on an individual basis. Let alone, we shall continue to do this.

"As a practical matter, this can only be done in the segregated pattern, and for those who would by integration destroy the education, culture, opportunity and friendship of both races, I simply state that our position of determined resistance remains unchanged."

Southern people are not, as you may have been told, captives of blind leaders who will not or cannot read the signs of progress.

The people demand that their public schools be separate. We hear sometimes about southern moderates. A moderate is an integrationist who isn't in too big a hurry. Fast or slow, most southerners are convinced that mingling the schools would be disastrous.

What is the aim of integration?

It is not improvement for white pupils. Educational standards in mixed schools would have to be reduced to the lowest common denominator.

It will not improve education for Negro pupils. An atmosphere of tension does not promote learning. Discipline would have to suffer when any classroom incident is likely to explode into a racial incident.

It would not promote good relations between the races. Both North and South, integration or attempts at it have created racial trouble.

It will not create respect abroad for the United States. Internal squabbles involving troops, police, and constant arguments over rights and freedoms are signs of unstable conditions.

If the aim of integration is to sustain legal and sociological theories, without regard to practical effects on human beings, it is not defensible.

If the aim is to humiliate the white southerners, it is beneath contempt.

If the aim is to raise the status of the Negro, it won't work. The Negro needs many things more than he needs association with white people on an involuntary basis.

While national diplomacy courts favor in foreign countries, on the domestic front the American Government is not seeking to win friends and influence people in Southern States.

I shall not attempt to explore the reasons for those policies. They are in large measure political.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has been able to exploit these political forces. It has achieved a balance of power out of all proportion to its actual worth. Millions of white southerners have become an unorganized and oppressed minority.

The NAACP creates division and animosity. Some of its leaders have official records of contacts with subversive organizations. Their names have been published in reports of congressional committees.

With its political allies, the NAACP has set up a virtual censorship on race.

One minor bit of evidence is the removal of dialect from magazines, books, and newspapers. Though Negro dialect is forbidden, a California cartoonist who lampooned the Southern speech of Governor Faubus was singled out recently for some kind of freedom award.

Negro crime in cities is appalling, but the facts are being deliberately disguised in the paper curtain press.

Superior force may overwhelm the South, as it has done before. But troops and police cannot forever suppress millions of resourceful people.

I do not believe the rest of the country wants some of the States to become concentration camps for the sake of mixing white and colored children against their parents' will.

MASTERS OF DECEIT IN THE SCHOOL CRISIS

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALFORD], if his documentation, which I have not seen, is accurate, has performed, I think, a useful service. I am sure that all of us in the House of Representatives are absolutely opposed to communism and to subversion in any of its forms.

The gentleman told the House several days ago that he would present to this body evidence that subversive forces are the real masters of deceit behind this school crisis in the South and the so-called civil-rights issue in America today; and today he has been discussing these matters.

I wonder if the gentleman could tell the Members of the House whether in his listing of the Communist cells alleged to have existed in certain educational institutions in the South, he is familiar with Commonwealth College, a former educational institution in his State which was cited by the Attorney General as a subversive organization.

Mr. ALFORD. May I say to the gentleman from New Jersey that I know that institution well. As a child I lived not many miles from that institution.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Is the gentleman aware that this institution has been listed by many groups as a Communist front and subversive?

Mr. ALFORD. Yes. May I say to the gentleman in answer to his question that this Commonwealth College, which existed nearly 40 years ago, I believe—that is correct?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. It was still in existence, however, as recently as 1940, was it not? Indeed, was it not founded in 1923 and closed in November 1940? Actually, it was cited as a Communist enterprise in 1944 by the House Un-American Activities Committee, and cited by Attorney General Clark in 1949 as Communist.

Mr. ALFORD. I do not know the exact date, but I know that it was practically unheard of by 1940. To answer the gentleman's question, he well knows that 40 years ago or 35 years ago certainly very little was known of the Communist conspiracy in this country.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. That is so; but, as a matter of fact the conspiracy existed, just as it does today. Was it less dangerous then than it is now? I think not.

Mr. ALFORD. May I say to the gentleman why that institution was in Arkansas? It was in a hill section, a very poor section of the State, where the economic status of the people was very low at that time and there was no publicity at that time as to the type of institution it was. It was widely circularized at that time that that institution would offer to boys and girls in the hill section of the country an education if they would merely work on the farms of that area. I am well familiar with it.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Is the gentleman aware that the present Chief Executive of his State attended that college?

Mr. ALFORD. I am well aware of the fact that the gentleman was going to get to the distinguished Governor of our State.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I did not ask the gentleman that. But if you anticipated my remarks, then you must have been aware of the facts regarding your Governor. I'm wondering why you failed to mention these facts yourself, since you are giving us the facts regarding the subversive forces behind the school crisis and the so-called civil rights issue in America today.

Mr. ALFORD. May I say to the gentleman——

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further, if the gentleman will not respond to the question. I did not ask whether the gentleman was aware of my intentions, but whether he was aware that the Chief Executive of his State attended that college.

Mr. ALFORD. May I answer the gentleman?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. ALFORD. The gentleman was there only several days—that is, the distinguished Governor of the State of Arkansas. He has stated many times that after he found out the nature of the group, he left there. He was a poor boy who went to this institution; and I think it is very admirable that this man, the present Governor of Arkansas who, by the way, has a very honorable and outstanding war record and who has served his country well, has been cleared in every way possible by all the security agencies that are necessary. I think it is distinctively due him that I should at this moment call attention to the fact that a Gallup poll recently listed him as one of the 10 most outstanding men in the world.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I saw that, and I thank the gentleman.

Without having the facts at hand to know how long the Governor attended or under what circumstances, I make the point, however, that in this type of thing one can indict anyone who attended a college or university where there was a cell, perhaps. One can indict, if he is not fair, anyone who attended, especially, an institution which was listed.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Just to show how far you could go with that indictment, Governor Faubus was there long enough to be elected president of the student body, was he not?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Yes, he was.

Mr. HAYS. He was there long enough to later in a political campaign swear he never attended the college.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. That is my understanding. Governor Faubus is quoted in the Arkansas Gazette of August 1, 1954, as follows:

> I have never been a student or faculty member at the school (Commonwealth College) and never have attended a class there.

Mr. HAYS. That is documented. Understand, I am not saying by the process of guilt by association that the Governor of Arkansas was a Communist, but I am pointing out that by the process of guilt by association the facts are there, and they are there in documentation.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. That is right.

Mr. HAYS. He must have known a little bit about it or he would not later have denied that he went there.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I decline to yield at this time. I want to answer the gentleman from Ohio.

I do not subscribe to guilt by association any more in the case of the attendance of the Governor of Arkansas at Commonwealth College, which was listed as subversive, than by implication that anyone who belongs to the NAACP is subversive because it may have had subversives in it. I simply take this time to call attention to the fact that there are two edges to this sort of a weapon, and that if a person is to be indicted for having gone to the University of North Carolina, where at one time there existed, according to the gentleman from Arkansas, a cell, then thousands upon thousands of students at that great university are under indictment. If the gentleman from Arkansas would indict anyone by this method, then surely he must indict his great friend, Governor Faubus.

Mr. HAYS. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not charging the Governor of Arkansas with anything at all. I am merely using this as an illustration of what you could do if you set out to prove something by the doctrine of guilt by association.

I am sensitive about this because of some past hearings in this Congress under a committee that was set up allegedly to investigate foundations. They attempted to show that my university was at one time a Communist-front organization, Ohio State University, which, of course, is absurd. I am a little sensitive about this business of saying, "Well, someone went somewhere where there once was a Communist, ergo, he is automatically a Communist." I did not mean any reflection on the Governor of Arkansas. I certainly do not agree with a great many of his opinions, but I say he has a right to have them however much I may disagree with him.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I quite agree with the gentleman from Ohio. I did not take this time to indict the Governor of Arkansas, either. I think that on the basis of simply his attendance such an indictment would be unfair; as a matter of fact, it would be outrageous. I do take the time, however, to point out that the gentleman from Arkansas has cited what he thinks, apparently, and which I am looking forward to seeing in the RECORD, is chapter and verse. If by the same motive he is indicting, or by implication or inference his remarks can be used to indict, the Governor, I think the Governor should be cleared.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ALFORD. May I say that the distinguished Governor of Arkansas has never denied the fact that he has attended that school. The Governor of Arkansas has never denied the fact that he was elected the first 2 weeks as president of the student body.

May I ask the gentleman to point out anywhere in my remarks today where by inference I declared anyone to be a Communist? I am seeking the truth. It is high time that some patriot in America stood up on the floor of this House instead of playing pure and simple politics. We are asking for the truth for all America.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. That is right. And if we are going to have the truth, let us have all of it. I quite agree with the gentleman. I said at the outset that if his documentation is accurate, he has done a great service. I simply took this time to point out that, perhaps, his documentation is not as complete as it might be. I have already quoted the story in which the Governor denied having attended the school. Later, I understand, he admitted not only attending, but, as you have said, admitted he was elected president of the student body of Commonwealth College.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. MEYER. It seems to me quite regrettable that when this Nation faces a problem, and we do have a problem, in racial relations and the problem of human justice that instead of attempting to solve these problems with our hearts and with our minds and perhaps with a few laws also, but more in our hearts and in our minds, that we have to drag in the issue of communism into everything that we do. It seems to me it is quite regrettable on both sides. That is about all I have to say.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I agree with the gentleman that it is regrettable. I look forward with great interest to reading the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas in some detail to see just what was said.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. LINDSAY. I should like to say I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi in that, unquestionably, this is a subject which is not a local responsibility or a sectional responsibility, but it is a national responsibility. It becomes a national responsibility when we view what our brethren abroad think of us when they see racial unrest in this country and argumentation of this sort. But, I would say also that argumentation is necessary and desirable. Undoubtedly, members of the Communist Party have attempted to use racial unrest as a means of furthering their own cause. But, that is no excuse for the type of indictment such as has just occurred, as pointed out by the gentleman from New Jersey, where responsible men such as Harry Ashmore and responsible citizens of a local community who support men such as Harry Ashmore are placed in the same bed, so to speak, with members of the Communist Party. I cannot understand any broad statement to the effect that Harry Ashmore, or his supporters, are being used by members of the Communist Party who may be capitalizing on racial unrest for their own insidious purposes. Such statements beg the point.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Does the gentleman belive that all the members of the NAACP are Communist-led because it may be that there are some fellow travelers or other odd-ball characters of that sort in that organization? Although I do not know that there are, nor have I seen a single fact proving that there are such disreputable characters in the NAACP.

Mr. LINDSAY. Of course not. The point that I am trying to make is that I hope the gentleman from Arkansas does not mean to suggest that Harry Ashmore and his supporters are guided by anything except their own idealistic motives, the furthering of the best interests of the community, and the creation of equal justice and opportunity for all.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

INTEGRATION

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to ask for permission to address the House, but some things have developed here so I think we ought not to just end this little discussion on a note of frustration, you might say, until a couple of more things are said. Now, I do not want to prejudge anybody, but I would say from having listened very attentively and very carefully to the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas—and I want you to know and I would like the gentleman from Arkansas to know and his friends from the South can testify to this—that I have never taken this floor in the 10 years that I have been here to talk about racial relations or talk about segregation or desegregation or to talk about the FEPC or anything that most of my southern friends might consider repugnant. I have voted sometimes in a way that they did not approve of, but I have not demagoged about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. In just a moment.

I would like to say that I think the cause of the South, from which my mother came and in which I have many relatives, would be far better served by the kind of discussion that was had on television by the distinguished editor of a South Carolina newspaper, than it will be by some of the things that were said here this afternoon.

I believe that we have a problem in racial relations that we must solve. I think the Communists are going to exploit it in the world if we do not solve it. I think there are ways of solving it rather than pointing an accusing finger at people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to congratulate the gentleman in what he has just said. He has not agitated against the South. I would also like to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMPSON], because both of you gentlemen have managed to work this problem out very satisfactorily for yourselves and your districts. I notice both reside in segregated Virginia, rather than the District of Columbia, where you could enjoy what I am sure you will tell your people back home are the "blessings" of a checkerboard-integrated society.

Mr. HAYS. I thought when I yielded to the gentleman that I might get more than a needle. In my hometown where my daughter will go to school at least half the year, if I am so fortunate as to be reelected to this body, when she is old enough to go to school 2 years hence, is a desegregated school, as it has been since before the War Between the States. I attended a desegregated school in the grades, in high school, and at the university. Some of my colleagues at Ohio State University were members of the Negro race. One in particular is one of the great scientists of this country, one of our great cancer research experts. I am proud to say that he is an alumnus of our outstanding university.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. Not at this time. I will say to the gentleman that Ohio State was and is desegregated. The area in which I live when in Washington is going to be desegregated most any minute, if it has not already.

I want to say right here that I am very proud of the way the State of Virginia has handled the problem when it was faced with something that was repugnant to a great many of the citizens of that great State. I am proud of the fact that while they fought it as far as they could in the courts, because they did not believe in it, when the chips were down and the Governor was faced with the alternative of civil strife or legal compliance, he chose, although he did not like it, to meet the thing in a civilized, lawful, and legal manner.

I want to say to my distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that I am not ashamed of the fact that I live in Virginia when Congress is in session. It is well known back home. It was in the paper when we purchased property over there. I do not feel that I should offer him or anybody else any apology for living in Fairfax County.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. I, too, am proud of the fact that I live in Fairfax County. I would like to state to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that my children go to schools which are in the process of integration. They will remain in those schools if they are kept open. I am also very proud of the manner in which the Governor of Virginia has conducted this process. I have absolutely no objection, having gone to integrated schools, to my children going to integrated schools. I am delighted that they are going. I hope they admit more Negro children in northern Virginia to the school which my children attend.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield.

Mr. ALFORD. I would like at this point respectfully to call attention to the fact that we have gotten a little bit off the subject of my original remarks this afternoon, and to the fact that it has been implied here that we would by inference besmirch someone. The name of Harry Ashmore has been mentioned. I would like respectfully to submit that in no instance did we state anything relative to communism. We related about the national agitation. We sincerely believe in the presentation we made.

Mr. HAYS. I listened very carefully to the gentleman's statement. While I could not repeat exactly what he said I gained the very definite impression that it was not very favorable to Mr. Ashmore. I am going to read the gentleman's statement in the RECORD to see exactly what he did say.

I may be a little guilty of getting off the subject but I have had a great deal of feeling in the matter. As a matter of fact, I notice some Members got off onto the subject of elections, a matter which is properly before the Committee on House Administration. I do not want to prejudge anything said as I said in the beginning, but I do not think too much should be made of getting a little off the subject.

I would like to say to the gentleman with all the sincerity I possess that I believe the way to solve this problem is through the approach that was made on the television program the other night. I would like to congratulate not only the editor of the paper in South Carolina but also the secretary of the NAACP for their very moderate approach to this. I think they both deserve a great deal of credit; and I want to say in the presence of my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. RIVERS] that I thought his editor made a most moderate approach and a most sensible approach and a most convincing approach to defending his convictions perhaps more moderate, more sensible, and more convincing than anyone I have seen or heard either in this body or anywhere else.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield I just want to thank the gentleman for his very kind, generous, and statesmanlike statement.

TRAVEL EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, our Federal expenditures are rising fast enough without being jet propelled.

A businessman friend of mine has just returned from Europe on one of the new jetplanes. He informed me that there were two categories of passengers on the plane—the "deluxe" and the "economy" classes. The round trip fare for the deluxe is $903.40. For the economy class it is $478.70.

Most of the economy class passengers, he informs me, were businessmen who either paid their own way or were on expense account.

Most of the deluxe passengers were U.S. Government personnel. Uncle Sam paid the bill.

While I believe that Government personnel traveling on Government business should do so in average comfort, I doubt that the average citizen would approve their traveling in deluxe fashion. If the economy class is adequate for businessmen—and my friend says it is excellent—then it should be good enough for Federal employees. The savings on a round trip would be $427.70 per person.

A BILL TO PROVIDE FOR A COMMITTEE OF INDEPENDENT UNIONS AND UNRECOGNIZED LABOR GROUPS

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill that would provide for a committee on independent unions and unrecognized groups. This committee for independent unions would be comparable to the House Committee on Small Business.

Today there are two well-defined types of unions; namely, those directly affiliated with the AFL–CIO and those that are not affiliated with that organization.

Of the more than 65 million gainfully employed people in this country, the AFL–CIO claimed from 15 to 16 million. This was prior to the big layoffs that have reduced their membership substantially and extensive automation in industry in recent years. Further reduction resulted from loss of the Teamsters and several other unions that were eliminated for various reasons, including racketeering and unethical practices. With the exception of those left in the AFL–CIO, the remainder of the 65 million American workers are either in independent unions or as yet unorganized.

The proposed resolution would create a committee composed of 21 Members of the House. It would provide the smaller unions with a means whereby their problems could receive desired attention. It is my contention that these smaller unions are not presently receiving the attention which they rightfully deserve due to the fact that the governmental agencies dealing with labor are unduly influenced or dominated by current or former AFL–CIO officials. For example, it has been brought to my attention that the U.S. Department of Labor, where the Advisory Committee is located, is under the domination of the AFL–CIO.

It is my contention, therefore, that there is a present and pressing need for such a committee to deal with and for these independent unions and unrecognized groups. I am hopeful that the Congress will act on this matter.

To illustrate the point of view of small unions, I am placing in the RECORD a portion of the testimony of Roger Rettig, president, National Independent Union Council, which represents many small and independent unions, given before the Joint Economic Committee in its hearings on the President's 1959 Economic Report to the Congress:

STATEMENT OF ROGER M. RETTIG, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL INDEPENDENT UNION COUNCIL, BEFORE THE JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE ON THE PRESIDENT'S ECONOMIC REPORT, CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, FEBRUARY 9, 1959

My name is Roger M. Rettig. At this hearing I will present the position of the National Independent Union Council as president. I am also president of the Electrical Workers Independent Union in St. Louis, Mo. We maintain our national council headquarters here in Washington.

When appearing before this Committee on the Economic Report we wish to stress the importance of the independent labor movement. Of the more than 65 million gainfully employed people in this country more than 50 million are presently represented by independent unions or as yet unorganized. Most of the unions we represent, and for whom I speak today, are unions where the officials are elected directly by the employees in a particular shop, factory, craft, or industry where they work. Most of the representatives of these unions, including myself, are men and women who have worked on the job themselves and who are still in direct contact with the members.

In our relationship to the economic situation in this country, and to the organized labor movement, our position could be compared with the thousands of small businessmen in this country and their position as compared with the representatives of the giant corporations.

We note with interest that the President has given his analysis of the 1957–58 economic situation, including the recession which was so evident and painful for the members of our unions, who work for a living or were laid off, when we appeared before this committee last year. Now that there are signs of improvement, we believe it is time to analyze the reasons and to give credit where credit is due. Also to take necessary measures to bring about an improvement in this situation in preparation for the next unfavorable cycle.

The first significant factor of stabilization, that prevented the recent recession from becoming more acute, was undoubtedly the fact that union contracts in effect provided insurance of rates of pay, reasonable hours, and the consequent elimination of panic which always results when companies start slashing hours and wages and permitting one employee to underbid another in quest of a job due to temporary unemployment. Elimination of this inhuman competition can be credited largely to the seniority provisions of union contracts.

Other contributing factors that prevented the recession from becoming a crushing avalanche of depression resulted from unemployment compensation, old age assistance, and social security.

Likewise, the many pension and welfare funds, made available as a result of union contract negotiations, have been helpful in preventing greater depression as well as a lifesaver to those no longer employed.

History will show that organized labor has always been the strongest advocate of these objectives. They have been accomplished in spite of the strenuous objections of many business people who now benefit from stabilization directly related to contract negotiations and social legislation. We need only refer to previous conditions, that resulted in recessions or depressions, to verify these facts. This experience should be sufficient to obtain the full support of both labor and management in making further improvements. The opportune time for such action is at hand. Unfortunately, the tone of many business spokesmen at this time indicates they will oppose the very measures that have helped to save them from a more serious crisis as recently indicated. Therefore, we must call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to take the necessary measures to protect the Nation's economy. This economic committee is the logical starting place for a program that will provide that action and will result in the greater protection to all Americans.

On page 14 of his report, the President refers to consumer demands as a most significant factor in the resistance of the economy against recession. On page 15 specific reference is made to union leaders and the wage increases that are the result of negotiations with management. Sober reflection will indicate, to any reasonable person familiar with the facts, that increased incomes are necessary in order to expand this consumer demand. To make it a reality that will work "two ways," without giving consideration to these facts would be to ignore the best interests of all workers and their dependents. Since the cost of living continued to increase during the so-called recession despite heavy unemployment and shorter workweeks this emphasizes the necessity for further analysis and corrective action. Meaning, of course, reduced overtime and the drastic reduction in jobs and opportunities for advancement to higher paying classifications.

FARMERS AND INDUSTRIAL WORKERS HAVE COMMON INTERESTS

Now that farm prices are falling, certainly the farmer should not be blamed for the continuing high cost of living. Under these circumstances this phase of the national economy must receive fair consideration and assistance as needed. Affiliates of the National Independent Union Council have long recognized that the workers' welfare is closely alined with that of the small farmer and the agricultural worker in this country. We continually seek to strengthen these bonds.

PROFITS AND DIVIDENDS

Before placing the blame on labor, for certain alleged inflationary trends, it would be wise to consider the facts with respect to other economic interests. For example: Recent reports indicate that profits and dividends are now rebounding much more briskly from their sharp decline than is unemployment. Almost unnoticed, says one statement, is this roller-coaster-like move of profits, has been the unshakable steadiness of corporate dividends. While many firms trimmed payments, enough increases were voted by others, and enough companies decided reserve justified unchanged payments even though earnings had fallen, to keep the flow of dividend checks to American investors at about the same pace in 1958 as in 1957. During both of these years, as you know, the recession in business took place and so many workers were laid off. The report also makes reference to stocks and prices. It is common knowledge that stock prices have gone up almost nine times as fast as the dollar has depreciated in the past decade. Much of this occurred during the business recession. That is the startling conclusion that leaps out of a chart drawn by this statistical reporting service. Use of the same 1947–49 base period, as the Bureau of Labor Statistics uses for its Consumer Price Index, shows that the Dow-Jones average of 30 industrial stocks had climbed by the end of the year to more than 310 percent of its base, while the consumer prices have risen only 123.8.

We do not claim to be infallible authorities on the meaning of all aspects of these facts. However, we suggest careful consideration of them when attempts are being made to legislate morals for labor. We doubt that it can ever be accomplished by legislation for any group. However, there is evident necessity for establishing some ethical practices to regulate business concerns when moving or closing their plants in certain localities. Especially when this action leaves the local economy destitute simply because the company is induced to locate their operations elsewhere due to substandard wages, taxes, or similar advantages. By this procedure the company often shirks their responsibility, to the older employees as well as the community largely responsible for the original success of the company.

* * * * *

Further extension of minimum-wage laws coverage and a substantial increase in the minimum requirements are necessary. Much industry now excluded as being intrastate, as well as the exceptions made for Puerto Rico and the Territories, should be remedied.

The President makes reference to technological research and development. We wish to stress the importance of this factor in the lives of every American, and especially to those who work in factory and on farm for a living. We have found that some engineering firms are prone to concentrate more on high pressure selling of machines and methods that will eliminate men than they are with actual increased production. Unfortunately, there is great appeal to management when they are offered any new machine or method that will result in the elimination of manpower element, regardless of cost. We believe that it is evident to all reasonable people that the displacement of manpower alone is not necessarily in the best interest of our country if it simply results in creation of greater unemployment problems. Automation by industry is undoubtedly responsible for a substantial amount of the current unemployment, otherwise current production levels could not have been attained with less workers than previously required. Provisions to rehabilitate and relocate such displaced workers are essential, and unless this responsibility is recognized by industry it must be met my law.

Certainly, the most complicated machines on earth will not purchase or consume the foods raised by our farmers or buy the products necessary to keep factories in operation. Those responsible for eliminating workers, who have given long and faithful service, should also recognize their responsibility to train such workers for other jobs they are capable of performing and where there is demand for their services. Unless such a program is voluntarily adopted by management action along this line. It will certainly be a most practical application of an extended educational program beneficial to all segments of the economic picture in America.

In the President's summary of the 1959 picture we find that consideration is missing with respect to raising the minimum-wage requirements of the Federal law. In order to bring about the realization of the principle of "equal pay for equal work," it is most essential that this law be amended accordingly.

We wish to stress that our organization opposes any additional legislation that would further handicap small unions. By requiring burdensome filing and elaborate bookkeeping restrictions, totally unjustified since local control keeps them free from corruption, it will certainly discourage American workers from exercising their right of self-organization.

With respect to granting jurisdiction over any phase of the collective bargaining process to the States, until such States have passed adequate legislation that will insure protection of the rights of workers to organize and bargain collectively, we take the position that it would be most untimely. Your sincere consideration and recommendations regarding these suggestions are requested.

WE NEED A YOUTH OPPORTUNITY PROGRAM

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues legislative proposals which, in my opinion, reflect a constructive approach to the academic problems in expanding and offering educational opportunities to the young people of our country. My distinguished colleague in the other body, Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, has aptly called these a "youth opportunity program."

I am more than pleased to report, Mr. Speaker, that I am joining Senator HUMPHREY today in introducing in this body identical legislation to that which he is presenting to his colleagues. I am sure there can be no contention created by my statement that we face grave and pressing academic challenges. Three of the measures which I am introducing today reflect an effort to meet this situation.

One bill, the Student Aid Act of 1959, would establish a Federal scholarship program. Unfortunately, the National Defense Education Act of 1958 does not provide for scholarships, and while the loan provisions in this act represent a step in the right direction, it is my considered opinion that we must go beyond this initial concept by instituting a Federal scholarship program. The need is apparent. For example, a survey made by the Office of Education indicates that more than 70,000 qualified students who requested aid from colleges and universities were denied scholarships in 1957–58. It is indeed a waste of our most important resource to deny to our young qualified men and women a chance for personal educational advancement which would be beneficial not only to the individual but to the Nation as a whole.

A second measure, the "Educational Tax Credit Act of 1959," is designed to offer a further stimulus to education by means of providing a tax credit for parents paying tuition and fees for children attending institutions of higher learning. The proposed 30-percent income tax credit would mean a good deal to those parents who find themselves in the low or middle income group. A $450 limit is imposed on that tax credit each year.

A third measure, Mr. Speaker, the School Construction Act of 1959, is being introduced to supplement the Murray-Metcalf bill for school construction and teachers' salaries, a measure, which I am pleased to say, that I have introduced in this session. May I just say that the approach in these two respective measures differs, but because it is my view that all avenues of thought should be considered in this pressing matter of additional school construction, I am thus sponsoring this supplemental proposal in the hope that the best possible solution will be forthcoming from the Congress. This new construction bill would leave responsibility in State and local hands for administering actual construction.

As I have noted already, these measures have been introduced in an effort to solve crucial problems facing our academic life. In addition, Mr. Speaker, I am submitting a fourth bill—as part of this youth opportunity program—which is of a nonacademic nature, but of equal importance. This measure, the "Delinquent Children's Act of 1959," proposes to provide for assistance to and cooperation with States in strengthening and improving State and local programs for the diminution, control, and treatment of juvenile delinquency. The measure calls for the establishment of a Federal Advisory Council on Juvenile Delinquency in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and authorization of funds for State and local programs.

It is well known to my colleagues, I am sure, that since 1949 we have seen a steady increase in national delinquency statistics; an increase that outstrips substantially the growth of our child ppoulation. Our first concern should be with prevention of juvenile delinquency and obviously once a child has made a first wrong step, it is the responsibility of our civic community to take steps for rehabilitation toward useful citizenship.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that closely alined with this problem of prevention is the need to provide programs that will encourage our young people to act in a constructive and fruitful manner. In line with this, I introduced on January 7 of this year the Youth Conservation Act of 1959, also previously introduced in the other body by the able senior Senator from Minnesota. This act, which would set up a Youth Conservation Corps, would indeed be a step forward in the prevention of delinquency by improving the physical fitness of our young people, by providing useful as well as outdoor work, and by providing educational opportunities for boys and young men who have too much leisure time and not sufficient employment opportunities available to them.

The four measures which I have introduced, plus my measure calling for the establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps, have been incorporated in an omnibus bill which is also being submitted today.

If I may briefly summarize, Mr. Speaker, the omnibus measure—the youth opportunity program—proposes the following:

First. College scholarships for outstanding and deserving high school students.

Second. Construction of schools so that our Nation's children can get a decent education in a decent environment.

Third. Liberalizing tax writeoffs to parents sending their children to college.

Fourth. Attacking the growing juvenile delinquency problem through prevention and rehabilitation.

Fifth. Providing through the Youth Conservation Corps program healthy constructive work for young men in their late teens and which, incidentally, would be in line with our efforts in the conservation field.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Congress, aware of the seriousness of the problems and the need to advance our national educational posture, will give all due consideration to these proposals.

INVALIDATING STATE STATUTES

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ABBITT] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which I hope will serve as a deterrent to the Supreme Court of the United States in invalidating State statutes.

In August 1958 I introduced a similar bill. I explained at the time I introduced the bill that the hour was late and that I realized there was no hope of enacting the bill into law at that session, but that I wanted the Members of the Congress and the people of our great Nation to have an opportunity to study the legislation so that we would be in a position at this session of the Congress to act on the measure.

I have today reintroduced the bill, and I hope that we will have early and favorable action on this measure by the Congress, as it is of vital importance if constitutional government is to be preserved in America.

It is a very simple bill. It provides that the Supreme Court of the United States, in reviewing a final judgment or decree of a State or Federal court, cannot take any action which would invalidate a State statute on the grounds of it being repugnant to the Constitution except by a unanimous decision of all of the Supreme Court Justices participating in the review.

In other words, the decision of the Supreme Court must be concurred in by all of the Justices before their decision can invalidate or declare unconstitutional such State law.

I am alarmed at the recent great number of decisions by the Supreme Court declaring State statutes and State constitutional provisions unconstitutional by 5-to-4 decision. Twenty-nine of these cases have been decided by the Supreme Court since 1950. In a little over 7 years, the Supreme Court has knocked down and held unconstitutional, by a sharply divided Court, State statutes or State constitutional provisions in 29 instances.

Apparently the majority of the High Court cares nothing about precedent but is foisting upon our people their own whims and ideas about social justice.

Only last fall, it became necessary for the chief justices of the State supreme courts to lash out at the intemperate and unbridled usurpation of authority by the Supreme Court. Never before in the history of this Nation has it become necessary for chief justices of the various States to call upon the Justices of the Supreme Court of America to restrain their actions and to stop unwarranted and unlawful legislating by judicial fiat.

The chief justices of the States pointed out that a number of the decisions by the Court, which wiped out and obliterated the rights of the States and the privileges of our people, were decisions of a divided Court, in most instances on a 5-to-4 division.

The vast majority of the American people now must realize that our Supreme Court lacks the greatest of all judicial attributes—the power of judicial self-restraint in differentiating between constitutional rights and powers, on the one hand, and local self-government, on the other. Never before in the history of our Republic has the judicial branch arrogated unto itself dictatorial power to declare policy, to amend the Constitution, and to enact laws. If we are to survive as a nation of free people, as a republic of sovereign States existing on the private enterprise system, we must curb this dictatorial Court before they wreck our way of life and take from us the freedoms and liberties that have meant so much to the progress and growth of our great Nation.

I call upon the Members of this House who are interested in the preservation of constitutional government in America to give this matter serious consideration. If we permit the Court to run wild and gobble up the rights and privileges of our people, we will soon be living in a judicial oligarchy with the people and their rights and privileges dependent upon the whims and the sociological and psychological views and political philosophy of the nine men who happen to comprise the membership of the Supreme Court at that time.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. BAILEY for 2 hours, on Tuesday next.

Mr. MULTER, for 30 minutes, today.

Mr. IKARD, for 1 hour, on Thursday next.

Mr. WRIGHT, for 1 hour, on Thursday next.

Mr. BROCK, for 5 minutes, on Thursday next, and to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia, for 60 minutes, on Thursday, February 26.

Mr. ALFORD, for 50 minutes, today.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina, for 5 minutes, today, and to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. FOGARTY (at the request of Mr. MCDOWELL), for 1 hour on Thursday, February 19.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. BRADEMAS and to include extraneous matter.

(At the request of Mr. MCCORMACK, the following Members to extend their remarks and include extraneous matter:)

Mrs. KELLY.

Mr. TELLER.

Mr. KEOGH, to extend his remarks following the remarks made earlier regarding the late HERMAN P. EBERHARTER; and that all members of the Committee on Ways and Means desiring to do so have the same privilege.

Mr. BROOMFIELD.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MCDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 34 minutes p.m.), pursuant to its previous order and as a further mark of respect to the late Honorable HERMAN P. EBERHARTER, the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 18, 1959, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

576. A letter from the Acting Secretary of Defense, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to prevent the loss of pay and allowances by certain officers designated for the performance of duties of great importance and responsibility"; to the Committee on Armed Services.

577. A letter from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting the Eighth Annual Report of the Commissioner of Education on the administration of Public Laws 874 and 815, 81st Congress, as amended, including a statement of receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, pursuant to Public Laws 874 and 815, 81st Congress; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

578. A letter from the Librarian of Congress, transmitting a report of the affairs of the Library of Congress, including the copyright business, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958; to the Committee on House Administration.

579. A letter from the Acting Attorney General, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend section 4083, title 18, United States Code, relating to penitentiary imprisonment"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

580. A letter from the Under Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend section 216 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, to clarify the status of the faculty and administrative staff at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, to establish suitable personnel policies for such personnel, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

581. A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Civil Service Commission, transmitting a report pertaining to the positions in grades 16, 17, and 18 of the general schedule of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, pursuant to Public Law 854, 84th Congress; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

582. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting a copy of the order granting the application for permanent residence filed by Sze Ching Loh, pursuant to the Refugee Relief Act of 1953; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

583. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting copies of orders suspending deportation as well as a list of the persons involved, pursuant to Public Law 863, 80th Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

584. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting a copy of the order granting the application for permanent residence filed by Toy Yirsh Sin, pursuant to the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

585. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting copies of orders suspending deportation as well as a list of the persons involved, pursuant to the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

586. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, transmitting copies of orders suspending deportation as well as a list of the persons involved, pursuant to the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

587. A letter from the President, Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, transmitting the Annual Report of the Office of Civil Defense of the District of Columbia for 1958, pursuant to Public Law 686, 81st Congress; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. WILLIS: Committee on the Judiciary. H.R. 2339. A bill to revise, codify, and enact into law, title 39 of the United States Code, entitled "The Postal Service," with amendments (Rept. No. 36). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. HALEY: Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. H.R. 3648. A bill to regulate the handling of student funds in Indian schools operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 37). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ABBITT:

H.R. 4565. A bill to provide that the Supreme Court shall invalidate a provision of a State constitution or statute only by unanimous decision of the Justices participating; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ADDONIZIO:

H.R. 4566. A bill to protect the right of the blind to self-expression through organizations of the blind; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. ASPINALL:

H.R. 4567. A bill to provide that withdrawals or reservations of public lands shall not affect certain water rights; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. BENNETT of Michigan:

H.R. 4568. EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

First Washington Jazz Jubilee

OF

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 17, 1959

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, an exhibition entitled "Seven Ages of Jazz" will be opened this afternoon in the Library of Congress, where Americans may glimpse a little of their musical past during March while the Congressional Circle of Friendship House is sponsoring the first Washington Jazz Jubilee. A large group of congressional wives—many of whom live or have lived in Southeast Washington—has planned this jazz jubilee for the benefit of Friendship House, a settlement that has served the Southeast community for more than half a century. Culturally, however, it will benefit all jazz admirers in the Capital, who may participate in one aspect or another of this unusual celebration.

A jubilee can be either "a season or an occasion for general joy," Webster says, and this jubilee promises to be both. Its season will be the month of March; its occasions will be various. The Washington Jazz Jubilee began March 1, with last night's lecture on jazz at the National Gallery of Art by Prof.

Marshall Stearns of Hunter College, who is executive director of the Institute of Jazz Studies. The next event will be the opening of the Library of Congress exhibit at 4 p.m. today, when the Library and the Congressional Circle will hold a preview of "Seven Ages of Jazz." On March 12, the Gres Gallery at 1729 20th Street NW., will open a special exhibit of primitive African sculpture entitled "Rhythms in Form and Music." The celebration will reach its climax on March 16 with a unique concert by outstanding jazz musicians at a fund-raising benefit for Friendship House.

Throughout March the Library of Congress exhibition may be viewed in the North Gallery on the ground floor of the Main Library Building. There you may see music manuscripts, published music, books, recordings, and photographs selected from the Library's collections to recall some of the story of jazz. The display illustrates the seeds of jazz in folk music; its early appearance and development in New Orleans, Memphis, Los Angeles, San Francisco, St. Louis, and Kansas City; its flourishing in the "big time" of Chicago and New York; and its spread to nearly every corner of the world.

Many famous performers and composers have created and developed the fabric of jazz and its countless styles. They have made it a vital stream in 20th century creative effort, and they have given stimulus to the popular song, the musical comedy, and the music of the opera house and concert hall. Many of these figures of the jazz world will be featured in the Library's exhibit. A number of their works will be performed at the Washington Jazz Jubilee on March 16.

This jazz concert, to be held in Sheraton Hall at the Sheraton-Park Hotel on Monday evening, March 16, is the first program of its kind to be presented in the Nation's Capital. Mrs. Richard Bolling, the wife of my colleague from Kansas City and a well-versed authority on jazz, is general chairman of this benefit.

Because of the excellent talent and program proposed, I understand it is attracting nationwide attention. Mrs. Bolling and her committees have planned the production in two parts. In the first half of the evening, top-ranking jazz artist will present a fast-paced and colorful history of jazz by performing its music from such early forms as old spirituals, work songs, and New Orleans funeral marches to the contemporary "cool" school of modern jazz. Musicians brought to Washington for this event will illustrate the best in jazz from Congo Square to Carnegie Hall. After an intermission, the performers will break loose in a swinging "jam session" for jazz aficionados in the audience.

Some 1,500 guests wil join in this benefit for Friendship House, which at the present time faces new challenges and even greater responsibilities because of urban redevelopment in its area. Tickets may be obtained by telephoning Friendship House. The Jubilee is fortunate in having Mrs. Eisenhower and Mrs. Nixon as its ranking patrons among many members of official Washington and of the diplomatic corps, as well as other prominent Washingtonians.

The Congressional Circle of Friendship House has had advice from members of the Newport Jazz Festival in planning its benefit program, and its producer is Willis Conover, maestro of the Voice of America's popular "Music USA," a daily 45-minute program broadcast around the world. With "The World of Jazz," another program of the Voice, it is among our most popular broadcasts overseas. I need not remind my colleagues of the universal appeal of American jazz, nor of the fact that our jazz musicians have served us as excellent emissaries abroad, even in Iron Curtain countries.

Lithuanian Independence

OF

HON. PHILIP A. HART

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, February 17, 1959

Mr. HART. Mr. President, on Sunday, February 15, it was my great privilege to be the guest of the Detroit Lithuanian Organization Center in connection with the 41st anniversary of the Lithuanian independence commemoration ceremonies.

A magnificent program was presented by men and women who are faithful to their God and church, devotedly loyal to America, and strong in their contributions to the city of Detroit and the State of Michigan.

The organization adopted a resolution which reflects their firm convictions, and I ask unanimous consent that it be published in the RECORD, along with the remarks I made, so that all may know the sentiments and plea of these fine Americans of Lithuanian origin.

There being no objection, the resolution and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCLAMATION

During the 41st commemoration of the reinstatement declaration of Lithuanian's independence, sponsored by the Detroit Lithuanian Organization Center, held at Western High School, 1500 Scotten Avenue, Detroit, Mich., on February 15, 1959, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas in June 1940, Soviet Russia did invade the sovereign independent Republic of Lithuania with armed forces to protect Lithuanian independence and, against the will of the people, annex her to the Soviet Union; and

"Whereas the armed forces of the Soviet Union are still presently residing in Lithuania in complete and total disregard of the agreements, policies, and treaties which existed between the Soviet Union and other allies of World War II; and

"Whereas Russian Communists are still currently perpetrating deportations and exterminations of whole ethnic groups, plundering people and institutions, and separating the members of family, one from another: Therefore be it

"Resolved—

"That, on this 41st anniversary, we express our deep gratitude to the Government of the United States for nonacknowledgement of the fabricated incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union and for allowing the many thousands of refugees to find new homes in this country.

"That, we respectively recommend that our U.S. Government abstain from entrance into any alliance, pact, or agreement which would in any way whatsoever recognize the present day Russian empire.

"That the Government of the United States be urged to use all possible means to protect enslaved peoples from genocidal destruction and preserve their hope of eventual liberation.

"Finally, that a copy of this resolution, signed by the presiding officers, be transmitted to the President of the United States, Secretary of State, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, Michigan State Governor, and U.S. Senators and Congressmen from the State of Michigan."

EXCERPTS OF REMARKS BY SENATOR PHILIP A. HART, DEMOCRAT, OF MICHIGAN, TO THE DETROIT LITHUANIAN ORGANIZATION, DETROIT, MICH., HONORING LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Tomorrow, February 16, marks the 41st anniversary of the restoration of the independence of Lithuania. From 1918 to 1940 Lithuania stood among the family of free nations and made her contribution to the society of free peoples.

Thereafter, Lithuania was absorbed behind the Iron Curtain. There is no commerce, either commercial or cultural, between our shores and theirs. Not even newsmen are allowed to visit the occupied country.

And yet we have ways of knowing that the spirit of independence there has not been crushed. We have every reason to hope that one day it will again be a free and independent nation. Meanwhile it is noteworthy that our own country has never recognized the annexation of Lithuania by the Soviet Union, and that our broadcasts in the Lithuanian language are providing a tangible evidence of our interest as well as a source of knowledge of the free world.

We are also fortunate that our own civilization is enriched by a million Lithuanian Americans who are making their special contribution to the growth of our Nation. In our own State of Michigan, they are counted among our most civic-minded, upstanding citizens.

It is my hope and belief that you can be counted upon to insist that our foreign policy be based on a realization that as the strongest free nation of the world we must cooperate with the peoples of the world who are aspiring to gain or regain the right to determine their fate and the opportunity to improve their standard of living. This may mean some sacrifice on our part; and there are some 4½ million in this country, unemployed, who are in no position to be sharing at this time. But I am confident that we have the resources and the ability, given the proper leadership, to solve these perplexing problems here at home and still be able to lend a helping hand to those in other lands temporarily less fortunate than ourselves.

With the best effort of us all, I'm sure we can do it.

Diversion of Water From the Great Lakes Into the Illinois River

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 17, 1959

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under consideration at the moment in the House Committee on Public Works, of which I am a member, is a perennial subject. That is the question of whether additional water should be drained from the Great Lakes into the Illinois Waterway. I would like to include my remarks before the committee on this subject in the RECORD:

Mr. Chairman, we who are members of the House Committee on Public Works have a relatively simple problem before us in the matter of an additional 1,000 cubic feet per second diversion of water from the Great Lakes into the Illinois River.

The question is whether we are going to keep our bucket filled after we have punched a hole in the bottom.

All of us agree that a full bucket—in this case the Great Lakes—is a desirable state of affairs, not only for our vast Midwest region surrounding the Great Lakes, but for our neighbor, Canada, as well.

From this year on, we are going to need an especially full bucket. We on this committee are well aware that the St. Lawrence Seaway, our dream in the Midwest for more than a half century, will become a full-fledged working reality later this year.

Now we are going to try to pull the plug.

We in the Great Lakes region have been bothered by inadequate channel depths for a number of years, and we will continue to be bothered in the future when the larger oceangoing ships start plying our waterways in ever-increasing numbers. The proposal before us today is to make these channels even shallower and narrower by the diversion of additional water from the Great Lakes.

We are asked to approve a 1-year test of this extra diversion which will bring the total to an average of some 2,500 feet per second, and much more when peak volumes are drained off Lake Michigan. We can only conclude that most of the water will be diverted during the height of the already short Great Lakes shipping season.

May I point out to my colleagues that there is no reason for a 1-year test of this added diversion plan under existing circumstances. Such tests can only bring harm to the Great Lakes States and Canada.

First of all, we have in the U.S. Corps of Engineers reports from last year stating that the full effects of such diversion would not be felt for a 3-year period at the very earliest. So, next year we will be faced with the prospect of these same people coming in here and asking for a continuation of the extra divergence so they can give this plan a fair test.

But this same engineer's report points out another fact which seems to have been grossly overlooked by some of the members of this committee. That is that it will take some 15 years for the Great Lakes to build up enough water to completely dissipate all effects of the temporary diversion. We are asked, therefore, to give this plan a 1-year trial. Then we will be asked to give another 2-year trial period. But if the calculations of the engineers are not correct and more damage is done to our lake shores, our channels, and our harbor depths, then it is going to take us 15 years to correct the mistake. In my opinion, that is too great a chance for our Nation to take in a matter which has such grave consequences to the economy of such a vast portion of our country.

Now, it has also been indicated in the newspapers that some of our committee members have said that Canada has no objections to this diversion. After checking, I find that such is not the case. Members of the Canadian Parliament not only continue to object to this extra diversion, but Canadian opposition has, in fact, stiffened on this plan during the past few months. As yet, the Canadian Government has not taken a formal stand on this matter. However, a statement of Canadian policy is expected within the next 30 days.

Canada has as much at stake in this matter as we have. The water we drain off the Great Lakes belongs as much to our great ally as it does to us. We should have absolute assurance that Canada has no objections and no reservations to this extra diversion before we take any action whatsoever.

Finally, we have been told that this hearing will be on the basis of facts alone. One of the facts in this matter, gentlemen, is that those States which are opposed to this extra diversion were not given enough time to prepare their cases before this committee hearing.

Because of the lack of time afforded by the committee to the gathering of new facts and the short notice given on the start of these hearings, I would recommend to my colleagues that we continue to take testimony from the gentlemen present and then give them an opportunity to be heard before this committee at a later date during this session of Congress.

Thank you.

Workmen's Benefit Fund Celebrates Its 75th Anniversary Year

OF

HON. LUDWIG TELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 17, 1959

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Speaker, on October 19, 1884, a small group of German-American immigrants founded the Workmen's Benefit Fund of the United States of America, to provide mutual help in times of economic crises. Since that time, this fine fraternal order has grown to a membership of 58,000 in 26 States.

This year, the Workmen's Benefit Fund celebrates its 75th anniversary with a series of outstanding events, including its 75th anniversary national convention which will be held in Atlantic City, N.J., from June 15, 1959, to June 21, 1959, and a diamond jubilee celebration which will be held in New York City on Sunday, October 18, 1959. I am very pleased that this event will be held at a site in my district and take this opportunity to welcome the officers and the members of the Workmen's Benefit Fund and to wish them success on the occasion of their 75th anniversary year.

The Foreign Affairs Committee Should Review Local Currency Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDNA F. KELLY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 17, 1959

Mrs. KELLY. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable discussion during the past few months concerning the possible uses for and the extent of the local currencies held by the United States and of counterpart funds. Counterpart funds are those derived from the mutual security program through the sale of commodities in the foreign country. They do not belong to the United States but are under the joint control of the United States and the local government.

These counterpart funds are, in effect, matching funds provided by the foreign country to those provided by the United States. Up to 10 percent of counterpart funds are set aside for the uses of the U.S. Government such as local currency administrative costs.

Local currencies belonging to the United States are solely owned by the United States. The United States owned local currencies are derived from a variety of sources, United States income tax collections, sales of surplus property, repayment of loans, the 10 percent counterpart described above, and so forth. The greatest portion of these United States owned funds, however, is derived from the sale of surplus agricultural commodities under Public Law 480 and under the Mutual Security Act.

There follows a summary of local currencies owned by the United States and of counterpart under the mutual security program. The figures shown reflect sums on hand as of June 30, 1958.

Mr. Speaker, I should emphasize that many of these funds and much of this counterpart are already committed for new embassies and consulates, for support of armed forces, for development projects, and so forth. Furthermore, most of the Public Law 480 funds can be spent only pursuant to the agreements with the purchasing country which, in many instances, restricts the use of such funds.

Mr. Speaker, the Bureau of the Budget administers some of these local currencies. The International Cooperation Administration administers others, the Department of Defense still others, and so on. In view of the lack of central control in the executive branch, it would appear that some mechanism should be devised to provide such control both in the executive branch and in the Congress. I think that it would be most appropriate if the Foreign Affairs Committee would undertake a thorough review and study of the entire local currency situation. I think that the Foreign Affairs Committee is best equipped for this task.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, the summary to which I previously referred, of the foreign currencies owned by the United States or jointly controlled by the United States and other countries as of June 30, 1958.

Status of foreign currencies owned by United States or jointly controlled by United States and other countries, as of June 30, 1958

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Romans 15: 1: We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves.

Almighty God, may we be truly grateful for the hours of this new day affording us the opportunity and privilege of having some part in solving the world's many difficult problems.

We pray that Thou wilt inspire our finite and faltering minds and hearts with Thy divine spirit which alone can deliver us from all doubts and fears.

Show us how in this Brotherhood Week we may strengthen the bonds of understanding and good will between the nations of the earth and all the members of the human family.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBER TO THE JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 304, 79th Congress, as amended, the Chair appoints as a member of the Joint Economic Committee the following member on the part of the House: Mr. COFFIN, of Maine.

A JOINT RESOLUTION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES TO LIMIT THE TENURE OF SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to limit the tenure of Senators and Representatives in Congress. This resolution provides that no person who holds the office of Representative in Congress for the whole or major portion of each six consecutive full 2-year terms occurring after the ratification of this article shall again be eligible to hold the office of Representative in Congress until 2 years shall have elapsed from the date of the expiration of the sixth of such consecutive terms.

A similar provision is contained in the resolution for an equal period of limitation for the office of Senator. This constitutional amendment would temper the seniority rule considerably. It should be noted here that after the sabbatical leave as it were at the end of the 12-year period the Senator or the Congressman could embark upon another set of terms equal to 12 years if the people wanted him.

The seniority rule is deeply entrenched in the Congress. It has prevailed for more than a century in the Senate and for nearly half that time in the House of Representatives. The framers of the most recent reform of Congress, the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, avoided it like the political plague. Serious consideration of this resolution coupled with affirmative action by the Congress will result in the positioning of members on committees in a more rational and more soundly based method of selection.

HOME RULE LEGISLATION

Mr. BASS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. BASS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues of both parties in introducing legislation to grant home rule to the District of Columbia. The bill I am introducing has the endorsement of the President who recently declared that it would be unconscionable to delay any longer in granting statehood to Hawaii and home rule to Washington.

I share fully the President's view. This House will, in the next few weeks, approve statehood for Hawaii. I do not see how we can then deny the more modest right of local self-government to the people of the District.

This legislation is a carefully drafted measure which will provide a practical and workable government for the District of Columbia and, at the same time, fully protect the national interest in Washington as the Nation's Capital. It vests legislative authority over local affairs in an elected assembly and permits the assembly to provide for either an elected or appointed school board as the people of the District may choose. It grants the District a nonvoting Delegate in Congress, as Alaska in the past and Hawaii presently have had.

The detailed organization of the District Government and a plan for orderly transition from the present government are carefully spelled out in the bill.

At the same time, Federal supervision and ultimate Federal authority are amply protected. The Governor is appointed by the President, with Senate confirmation. The President is given a veto over acts of the District Government which involve a Federal interest. And of course, final authority remains, as it must under the Constitution, with the Congress.

I do not believe that anyone will deny, in principle, the justice of permitting the more than 800,000 people who live in Washington to govern their local affairs as American citizens. I do not see, therefore, what valid grounds for opposition there are to such a reasonable and practical application of the principle as is embodied in the present bill. Since self-government for the District was first established by the generation which, very largely, created our Constitution, and since the Supreme Court has reaffirmed its validity only 6 years ago, there is no serious doubt of its constitutionality.

And, obviously, in establishing local government, Congress is not relinquishing its right or abdicating its responsibility. This is a legislative enactment that can be modified, improved, or even revoked as experience dictates. I am hopeful that we can consider this bill in a reasonable and conciliatory spirit; that we can forget old arguments and lay aside old prejudices. If we can do so, I am confident that the House will be given the opportunity to consider this legislation and that it will by a large margin demonstrate its faith in the principle of government by the people.

TAX EXEMPTION FOR U.S. CITIZENS WHO PROVIDE MAJOR SUPPORT FOR FOREIGN EXCHANGE STUDENTS

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, together with other Members of the House I have introduced a bill which I trust will have the support of all Members.

Several American organizations such as the American Field Service, the Grange, International Christian Youth Exchange, National Catholic Welfare Conference, American Friends, and Michigan Council of Churches have programs under which foreign high school students attend schools in the United States for a year. While in this country these students are provided with room and board by individual American families. These families are of moderate means and are not reimbursed for the expenses which they thus incur.

These programs have proved very successful and are the means for promoting good international relationships and understanding. They should be encouraged for they are rendering a real service.

My bill would encourage American citizens to continue these programs by giving them an additional $600 tax exemption for each foreign student supported while in this country. On the basis of past records the tax loss to the Government would be less than $200,000 annually. More good will between our Nation and others would be accomplished than by millions of dollars spent under our foreign aid program.

During the current school year which started last September, 1,523 foreign high school students attended U.S. schools under these programs. It is anticipated that 1,869 will attend during the school year starting next fall.

Total exemptions for the latter number would amount to $1,121,400. Income tax at the rate of 20 percent on that sum would be $182,760, which would be the tax loss to the Government. The Government could not buy good will for less.

COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND ASTRONAUTICS

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Science and Astronautics have permission to sit this afternoon and during the rest of the week during general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY INCOME TAX ACT OF 1959

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 171 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4245) relating to the taxation of the income of life insurance companies, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed three hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment. No amendment shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment. At the conclusion of such consideration, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], and pending that I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 171 makes in order the consideration of H.R. 4245, known as the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959. The resolution provides for a closed rule, waiving points of order against the bill, and three hours of general debate on the bill.

H.R. 4245 provides a permanent method of taxing life insurance companies for the calendar year 1958 and subsequent years. The 1942 formula for taxing life insurance companies is now in effect and will remain in effect unless new legislation is adopted.

This bill is expected to result in approximately $545 million in Federal income taxes being paid by life insurance companies with respect to the calendar year 1958. This can be compared with the $500 million which would be paid if the 1942 formula is continued, or $319 million if the 1959 stopgap formula were made applicable. For 1959 it is expected that under this new bill life insurance companies will pay about $585 million in Federal income taxes.

It has been shown that in many instances life insurance companies were paying taxes on only a small part of their income, while on the other hand small companies have had to pay the tax on their investment income although their total operations showed a loss. This bill seeks to correct these inequities.

The year-by-year extension of stopgap treatment has created uncertainty as to the tax treatment of life insurance companies, and these companies frequently have not known until after the end of the year in question what their Federal tax burdens would be for that year. This uncertainty can be removed only by finding a permanent means of taxing life insurance companies.

It would appear as though there is a definite need to enact corrective legislation in this field, and I urge the adoption of House Resolution 171.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, one of the questions that has been bothering all of us—and some reference was made to it yesterday—is the unemployment situation with somewhere between 4 million and 4.5 million people that really want to work but cannot find a job even though willing to pay a union for the right or privilege of earning a living—a situation which demonstrates the truth of the contention that it is industry—employers—not unions which provide jobs. Then along comes the question as to whether the taxpayers can finance public works, useful works—not leaf raking like we had one time—to create and maintain work opportunities—something really useful and beneficial to the country as a whole. We must answer this question sometime, but before we get to it, it might be well to take a look at the real situation—some of the reasons causing unemployment.

Reference was made yesterday to this statement—and it was in the papers again this morning—about Reuther suggesting a march on Washington to make the Congress and the administration conscious of the fact that there is unemployment. We all know about the unemployment. Our home folks write us about that. We have different ideas as to its cause. Here is one from a union official. This comes from the Detroit Free Press. It is captioned—although it has to do with unemployment—"Why Are We on Strike?" It states:

> Just how much longer do the union brass think they are going to intimidate their members and deprive them of the means of making a living? We are told strikes are weapons against management for better bargaining power, but it has been used so often that it is beginning to backfire on us and defeat its purpose.
> We are wondering if our officials aren't getting so power-happy that they have forgotten completely their duties and obligations to their members as leaders and representatives. We do not wish to find ourselves in similar positions as the people of Nash Kelvinator, Hudson, Packard, Kaiser-Frazer, to cite a few; we don't want our officials gambling on our future.
> The purpose of the union was to improve working conditions in all phases for the members, but demands must be realistic.

That is something to think over, is it not, because the employer, before he can pay a higher wage—at least, that has always been my understanding, and I should be glad to have the advice of my very learned and well-informed friend from Iowa as to whether I am mistaken about that; but I always supposed that in order to pay the wage, the employer must sell something at a profit. That is, if he is in the market. Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. GROSS. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. So do I and so does this union official. He says further:

> What is to be gained if our demands are such that we either have to go on strike for months, or the companies feel compelled to shut their plants and move from the area.

That is, from Detroit, where Williams and Reuther have fixed the situation so that nobody, or at least very few, who want to make a profit, can do so. Chrysler only lost $33 million last year. I do not know how much of a surplus they have, but they are getting down to bedrock. And when its surplus has been paid out, it just cannot continue to operate. Continuing with this statement:

> We at Excello, Local 49, Club 500, believe in unions and we are going to have a union, but the kind in which our leaders are willing to work for the members and not dictate to them.

Now, get this on unemployment:

> We are now entering the 17th week of strike—thanks to our present union officials and so-called leaders—and for what? For a contract that could be had without this long and costly strike.
> As for Walter Reuther in his proposal for a national march of the unemployed on Washington, wouldn't it be wiser for him to start marching down to local 49 first and see why we aren't working when we have work waiting for us.

The real union boys do not want unemployment compensation. They want jobs. Nor do they want their money spent for political campaigns. And surely their wives do not want them sitting around their kitchens griping. They want them out on their jobs and bringing home that paycheck. Does not my friend think that is so? I ask my friend from Iowa, is that not the way it is? I think so.

The union official writes:

> The above statements may get me to lose the present office that I'm holding but that too is expected from the present officials.

And he signs his name George Vartanian, "Executive Board, Local 49, UAW."

It is all very well for our Democrat friends to think that the taxpayers' pocketbook is unlimited. And the union politician may have the same thought. But the number of people who have jobs who can pay taxes and unemployment compensation is becoming more limited every month, and their ability to do that will soon end.

Some of the unemployment would end if Hoffa would quit racketeering; Reuther forget his socialism, his desire to be a dictator, quit helping the Reds, his defiance of the law, his taking of a part of the workers' paycheck to make himself big.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely regret that circumstances did not permit my more active participation in the development of the legislation that is before the House today—the Life Insurance Company Income Tax Act of 1959. By direction of the Committee on Ways and Means I join with the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS], in cosponsoring this legislation.

The formula proposed in this legislation represents a marked departure from previously existing concepts of taxing life insurance companies. Under this proposed formula not only is a tax imposed on the free investment income of a life insurance company but also a tax is imposed upon the underwriting gains and capital gains realized by a life insurance company.

It is my belief that this approach to the problem of including the various types of income in the tax base is a sound one. I do not, however, necessarily concur in the revenue implications that result under the bill. I am impressed with the facts as set forth in the supplemental views signed by the 10 Republican members of the committee that we may be imposing too substantial a tax increase too abruptly on these important savings institutions. Regrettably, the apparent alternative to the favorable consideration of the bill before us today is for the 1942 formula to become applicable to 1958 income. It is recognized by virtually everyone that such a result would produce inequitable consequences.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, it will be my purpose to support the favorable consideration of the bill H. R. 4245. I do so, confident that this legislation will receive able consideration in the other body and that as the bill is finally sent to the Executive that it will be further improved.

I would make it clear that nothing in my remarks today are to be construed as criticism of the work of my committee colleagues who have labored so diligently and ably on this most difficult of all tax problems. To my committee chairman and to each of my committee colleagues I extend my most heartfelt congratulations to them for their accomplishment and express the hope that my circumstances will enable me to rejoin them soon so that I may assist in dealing with the difficult problems that may confront them in the weeks ahead.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I know of no opposition to the rule presently before us, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4245) relating to the taxation of the income of life insurance companies.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 4245, with Mr. UDALL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 35 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the bill which the Committee on Ways and Means has brought to the House, H.R. 4245, deals with one of the oldest problems in the income tax field. The ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], introduced an identical bill, H.R. 4246. How to tax life insurance companies was even a problem in the first Income Tax Act in 1862.

There are three basic and fundamental reasons for the difficulty in taxing life insurance companies.

The first reason is that the companies write contracts which commit them to make payments as far into the future as 100 years. There is generally no later opportunity for adjusting the price on this type of contract come war or come inflation. The current income earned on contracts of this sort must of course be measured after deducting the amount which the company thinks must be set aside as a reserve to meet its commitments which it has already made, even though these commitments may extend, as I say, far into the future.

A second special aspect of life insurance is that so far as its long-run operations are concerned, a life insurance company is similar to a bank. The money that is invested by the company is largely the premium advanced by the policyholder. This accumulation of premiums, or insurance reserves, as it is called, is generally available to the policyholder if he should surrender his contract, but in practice it is left with the company to cover the increasing mortality cost as the policyholder advances in age. There are interest earnings from the investment of these funds which are credited to the policyholder's account as part of the steady growth of his reserve. The beneficiary of this part of the investment income is the policyholder or his heirs, and it should not be taxed as income to the company. The problem is that this banking operation is so intertwined with the pure insurance operation that it is difficult to determine what investment income does go to the policyholders and what part goes to the company and in the case of a stock company, to the shareholder.

The third reason why the taxation of life insurance companies has been difficult over the years is that in this one industry—I think certainly more so than any other industry—the overwhelming bulk of the business is done by cooperative organizations. The large mutual insurance companies own—do not be misled by anything you have read in the papers to the contrary—but the 165 mutual companies own three-fourths of the assets of the industry, while they constitute less than one-seventh of the number of companies altogether.

The Members of this body will recall the historic difficulties of trying to measure the income of any cooperative organization. In the particular area of insurance, these difficulties are magnified in importance because a net tax advantage given to the large mutual companies could seriously damage competition in the industry and, if it were great enough, could destroy many of the 1,081 stock companies that are, generally speaking, small companies, or certainly smaller than the mutual companies.

Since 1921 the Federal tax law has assumed that the long-run savings, or banking aspect of life insurance constituted virtually the whole story of its true income. The Federal tax formulas have concentrated exclusively on the investment income earned by life insurance companies and have allowed a deduction for a portion of this income that could be considered as given over to the policyholder accounts and imposed a tax on the portion of this income which was considered to be at the disposal of the company itself.

The problem since 1921 with regard to life insurance companies has been how much of the interest was in fact credited to policyholders. The company books themselves were an unsatisfactory measure because to a considerable extent a company can, merely by changing its accounting procedures, make it appear that the money going into policyholder reserves came largely from interest. On the other hand, the accounts could just as well have shown that the reserve buildup came from the premium and not very much from the investment earnings.
